

The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was withdrawn on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

NOV 22 1977

NOV 18 1977

RORY O'MORE:

A NATIONAL ROMANCE.

BY

SAMUEL LOVER, Esq.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

"There's luck in odd numbers," says Rory O'More."

FIFTEEN ILLUSTRATIONS BY THE AUTHOR.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

RICHARD BENTLEY,
NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

1837.

LONDON :
PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLEY,
Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

823

L 94r

1837

v. 1

LIST OF PLATES.

VOL. I.

	Page
Home (Frontispiece)	113
The Schoolmaster	9
Molly and the Priest's dog	53
The Tinker	272
A pleasant Situation	242

VOL. II.

The domiciliary Visit (Frontispiece)	205
Breaking it	103
A new Cure for Popery	133
The Jollification	234
Entering the Glen	262

VOL. III.

What once was Home (Frontispiece)	189
The Hunt	35
The Coast	46
Rory's mistaken Piety	123
Farewell to the Land of the West	315

Nov 10 1838

Aug 51

Jan 20 1839

The Songs in this Work are all Copyright, have been set to Music by the Author, and are published by J. DUFF & Co. 65, Oxford Street.

RORY O'MORE.

CHAPTER I.

THE COTTAGE OF RORY O'MORE, WITH SCENERY, MACHINERY, DRESSES, AND DECORATIONS.

IN a retired district of the South of Ireland, near some wild hills and a romantic river, a small by-road led to a quiet spot, where, at the end of a little lane, or boreen, which was sheltered by some hazel-hedges, stood a cottage which in England would have been considered a poor habitation, but in Ireland was absolutely comfortable, when contrasted with the wretched hovels that most of her peasantry are doomed to dwell in. The walls were only built of mud — but then the doorway and such windows as the cabin had were formed of cut stone, as was the chimney, which last convenience is of rare occurrence in Irish cabins, a hole in the roof generally serving instead. The windows were not glazed, it is true, but we must not expect too much gentility on this point; and though the light may not be let in as much as it is the intention of such openings to do, yet if the wind be kept out the Irish peasant may be thankful. A piece of board—or, as Pat says, a wooden pane of glass—may occupy one square, while its neighbour may be brown paper, ornamented inside, perhaps, with a ballad setting forth how

“A sailor coorted a farmer’s daughter
That lived convaynient to the Isle of Man,” or, maybe, with a print of Saint Patrick banishing the sarpents—or the Virgin Mary in flaring colours, that one might take for “The king’s daughter a come to town,

With a red petticoat and a green gownd.”

But though the windows were not glazed, and there was not a boarded floor in the house, yet it was a snug cottage. Its earthen floors were clean and dry, its thatched roof was sound: the dresser in the principal room was well furnished with delf; there were two or three chairs and a good many three-legged stools—a spinning-wheel, that sure sign of peace and good conduct—more than one iron pot—more than one bed, and one of those four-posted, with printed calico curtains of a most resplendent pattern: there was a looking-glass, too, in the best bed-room, with only one corner broken off and only three cracks in the middle; and that further damage might not be done to this most valuable piece of furniture—most valuable I say, for there was a pretty girl in the house who wanted it every Sunday morning to see that her bonnet was put on becomingly before she went to chapel;—that no further damage might be done, I say this inimitable looking-glass was imbedded in the wall with a frame-work of mortar round it, tastefully ornamented with cross-bars, done by the adventurous hand of Rory O'More himself, who had a genius for handling a trowel. This came to him by inheritance, for his father had been a mason ; which accounts for the cut-stone doorway, windows, and chimney of the cottage, that Rory's father had built for himself. But when I say Rory had a genius for handling a trowel, I do not mean to say he followed the trade of his father — he did not, — it was a gift of nature which Rory left quite unencumbered by any trammels of art ; for as for line and rule, these were beneath Rory's consideration ; this the setting of the glass proved—for there was no attempt at either the perpendicular, the horizontal, or the plane ; and from the last being wanting, the various portions of the glass presented different angles, so that it reflected a very distorted image of every object, and your face, if you would believe the glass, was as crooked as a ram's horn—which I take to be the best of all comparisons for crookedness. Mary O'More, however, though as innocent a girl as any in the country, did not believe that her face was very crooked : it was poor Rory who principally suffered, for he was continually giving himself most uncharitable gashes in shaving, which Rory attributed to the razor, when in fact it was the glass was in fault; for when he fancied he was going to smoothe his upper lip, the chances were that he was making an assault on his nose, or cutting a slice off his chin.

But this glass has taken up a great deal too much time—which, after all, is not uncommon: when people get before a glass, they are very likely to linger there longer than they ought.

But I need not go on describing any more about the cottage,—nobody wants an inventory of its furniture, and I am neither an auctioneer nor a bailiff's keeper. I have said Rory's father was a mason. Now his mother was a widow—argal (as the grave-digger hath it), his father was dead. Poor O'More, after laying stones all his life, at last had a stone laid over him; and Rory, with filial piety, carved a crucifix upon it, surmounted by the letters I. H. S. and underneath this inscription:

“Pray for the soul of Rory O'More; Requiescat in pace.”

This inscription was Rory's first effort in sepulchral sculpture, and, from his inexperience in the art, it presented a ludicrous appearance: for, from the importance Rory attached to his father's soul—or, as he had it, sowl,—he wished to make the word particularly conspicuous; but, in doing this, he cut the letters so large that he did not leave himself room to finish the word, and it became divided—the word requiescat became also divided: the inscription, therefore, stood as follows:

You were thus called on to pray for the Sow in one corner, while the CAT was conspicuous in the other.

Such was Rory's first attempt in this way, and though the work has often made others smile, poor Rory's tears had moistened every letter of it, and this humble tombstone was garlanded with as much affection as the more costly ones of modern Père La-Chaise: and though there were none who could read who did not laugh at the absurdity, yet they regarded Rory's feelings too much to let him be a witness of such mirth. Indeed Rory would have resented with indignation the attempt to make the grave of his father the subject of laughter; for in no country is the hallowed reverence for father and mother more observed than in Ireland.

Besides, Rory was not a little proud of his name. He was taught to believe there was good blood in his veins, and that he was descended from the O'Mores of Leinster. Then, an old schoolmaster in the district, whose pupil

Rory had been, was constantly recounting to him the glorious deeds of his progenitors—or, as he called them, his “owld anshint anshisters in the owld anshint times,”—and how he should never disgrace himself by doing a dirty turn; “Not that I ever seen the laste sign iv it in you, ma bouchal,—but there’s no knowin’. And sure the devil’s busy wid us sometimes, and dales in timtayshins, and lays snares for us, all as one as you’d snare a hare or ketch sparrows in a thrap; and who can tell the minit that he might be layin’ salt on your tail onknowst to you, if you worn’t smart?—and therefore be always mindful of your anshisters, that wor of the highest blood in Ireland, and in one of the highest places in it too, Dunamaise—I mane the rock of Dunamaise, and no less. And there is where Rory O’More, king of Leinsther, lived in glory time out o’ mind; and the Lords of the Pale darn’t touch him—and pale enough he made them often, I go bail;—and there he was,—like an aigle on his rock, and the dirty English afeard

London, Richard Bentley, 1837.

The Ichthyomantis et Home

o' their lives to go within miles iv him, and he shut up in his castle as stout as a ram."

In such rhodomontade used Phelim O'Flanagan to flourish away, and delight the ears of Rory and Mary, and the widow no less. Phelim was a great character : he wore a scratch wig that had been built somewhere about the year One, and from its appearance might justify the notion, that Phelim's wig-box was a dripping-pan. He had a pair of spectacles, which held their place upon his nose by taking a strong grip of it, producing thereby a snuffling pronunciation, increased by his taking of snuff : indeed, so closely was his proboscis embraced by this primitive pair of spectacles, that he could not have his pinch of snuff without taking them off, as they completely blockaded the passage. They were always stuck low down on his nose, so that he could see over them when he wished it, and this he did for all distant objects ; while for reading he was obliged to throw his head back to bring his eyes to bear through the glasses ; and this, forcing the rear of his wig downwards on the collar of his coat shoved it forward on his forehead, and stripped the back of his pate: in the former case, his eyes were as round as an owl's; and in the other, closed nearly into the expression of disdain, or at least of great consequence. His coat was of grey frieze, and his nether garment of buckskin, equalling the polish of his wig, and surpassing that of his shoes, which indeed were not polished, except on Sunday, or such occasions as the priest of the parish was expected to pay his school a visit,—and then the polish was produced by the brogues being greased, so that the resemblance to the wig was more perfect. Stockings he had, after a sort; that is to say, he had woollen cases for his legs, but there were not any feet to them: they were stuffed into the shoe to make believe, and the deceit was tolerably well executed in front, where Phelim had them under his eye; but, like Achilles, he was vulnerable in the heel — indeed, worse off than that renowned hero, for he had only one heel.

unprotected, while poor Phelim had both. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, Phelim had a shirt — you saw he had ; but towards the latter end of the week, from the closely-buttoned coat, and the ambuscade of a spotted handkerchief round his neck, there was ground for suspicion that the shirt was under the process of washing, that it might be ready for service on Sunday ; when, at mass, Phelim's shirt was always at its freshest.

There was a paramount reason, to be sure, why Phelim sported a clean shirt in chapel on Sunday : he officiated as clerk during the service,—or, as it would be said amongst the peasantry, he “sarved mass;” and in such a post of honour personal decency is indispensable. In this service he was assisted by a couple of boys, who were the head of his school, and enjoyed great immunities in consequence. In the first place, they were supposed, from virtue of the dignity to which they were advanced, to understand more Latin than any of the rest of the boys ; and from the necessity of their being decently clad, they were of course the sons of the most comfortable farmers in the district, who could afford the luxury of shoes and stockings to their children, to enable them to act as acolites. The boys themselves seemed to like the thing well enough, as their frequent passing and repassing behind the priest at the altar, with various genuflexions, gave them a position of importance before the neighbours that was gratifying; and they seemed to be equally pleased up to one point, and to proceed in perfect harmony until the ringing of a little bell, and that was the signal for a fight between them.—When I say fight, I do not mean that they boxed each other before (or rather behind) the priest, but to all intents and purposes there was a struggle who should get the bell, as that seemed the grand triumph of the day: and the little bell certainly had a busy time of it, for the boy that had it seemed endued with a prodigious accession of devotion; and as he bent himself to the very earth, he rattled the bell till it seemed choking with its superabundant vibration ; while the Christianity of his brother acolite seemed to suffer in proportion to the piety of his rival, for he did not bow half so low, and was looking with a sidelong eye and sulky mouth at his victorious coadjutor.

As for Phelim, his post of honour was robing and unrobing the priest before the altar ; for in the humble little chapel where all this was wont to occur there was no vestry—the priest was habited in his vestments in the presence of his congregation. But Phelim's grand triumph seemed to be his assisting his clergy in sprinkling the flock with holy water. This was done by means of a large sprinkling-brush, which the priest dipped from time to time in a vessel of holy water which Phelim held, and waving it to the right and left, cast it over the multitude. For this purpose, at a certain period, the little gate of a small area railed round the altar was opened, and forth stepped the priest, followed by Phelim bearing the holy water. Now it happened that the vessel which held it was no other than a bucket.—I do not mean this irreverently, for holy water would be as holy in a bucket as in a golden urn ; but, God forgive me ! I could not help thinking it rather queer to see Phelim bearing this great bucket of water, with a countenance indicative of the utmost pride and importance, following the priest, who advanced through the crowd, that opened and bowed before him as his reverence ever and anon turned round, popped his sprinkling-brush into the water, and slashed it about right and left over his flock, that courted the shower, and were the happier the more they were wet.—Poor people ! if it made them happy, where was the harm of it ? A man is not considered unworthy of the blessings of the constitution of Great Britain by getting wet to the skin in the pelting rain of the equinox ; and I cannot, nor ever could see, why a few drops of holy water should exclude him.—But hang philosophy ! what has it to do with a novel ?

Phelim, like a great many other hedgeschoolmasters, held his rank in the Church of Rome from his being able to mumble some scraps of Latin, which being the only language his Sable Majesty does not understand, is therefore the one selected for the celebration of the mass. How a prince of his importance could be so deficient in his education may well create surprise, particularly as he is so constant an inmate of our universities.

Phelim's Latin, to be sure, could scarcely "shame the d—l," though certainly it might have puzzled him. It was a barbarous jargon, and but for knowing the phrases he meant to say, no one could comprehend him. Spiritu tuo, was from his mouth, "Sper-chew chew ô," and so on. Nevertheless, it was not in chapel alone that Phelim sported his Latin—nor in his school either, where, for an additional two-pence a-week he inducted his scholars into the mysteries of the classics (and mysteries might they well be called),—but even in his social intercourse he was fond of playing the pedant and astonishing the vulgar; and as poaching piscators throw medicated crumbs into the waters where they fish, so Phelim flung about his morsels of Latin to catch his gudgeons. Derivations were his fort; and after elucidating something in that line, he always said, “Derry wather!” and took snuff with an air of sublimity. Or, if he overcame an antagonist in an argument, which was seldom the case, because few dared to engage with him,—but, when any individual was rash enough to encounter Phelim, he always slaughtered him with big words, and instead of addressing his opponent, he would turn to the company present and say, “Now I ’ll make yiz all sinsible to a demonstheration ;” and then, after he had held them suspended in wonder for a few minutes at the jumble of hard words which neither he nor they understood, he would look round the circle with a patronizing air, saying, “ You persaive — Q. E. D. what was to be demonstherated !”

This always finished the argument in the letter, but not in the spirit ; for Phelim, though he secured silence, did not produce persuasion : his adversary often kept his own opinion, but kept it a secret too, as long as Phelim was present ; “for how,” as they themselves said when his back was turned, “could it be expected for them to argufy with him when he took to discoorsin’ them out o’ their common sense?—and the hoighth o’ fine language it sartainly was—but sure it wouldn’t stand to raison.”—How many a speech in higher places is worthy of the same commentary !

Perhaps I have lingered too long in detailing these peculiarities of Phelim ; but he was such an original, that a sketch of him was too great a temptation to be resisted : besides, as he is about to appear immediately, I wished the reader to have some idea of the sort of person he was.

The evening was closing as Phelim O’Flanagan strolled up the boreen leading to the widow O’More’s cottage. On reaching the house, he saw the widow sitting at the door knitting.

"God save you, Mrs. O'More!" said Phelim.

"God save you kindly!" answered the widow.

"Faith, then, it's yourself is the industrious woman, Mrs. O'More, for it is working you are airly and late: and to think of your being at the needles now, and the evenin' closin' in!"

"Oh, I don't call this work," said the widow; "it is only jist to have something to do, and not be lost with idleness, that I'm keepin' my hands goin'."

"And your eyes too, 'faith—and God spare them to you."

"Amin, dear," said the widow.

"And where is the colleen, that she isn't helpin' you?"

"Oh, she's jist gone beyant the meadow there, to cut nettles for the chickens—she'll be in in a minit. Won't you sit down, Mr. O'Flanagan?—you'd betther dhraw a sate."

"I'm taller standin', Mrs. O'More,—thank you all the same, ma'am. And where would Rory be?"

" Why, indeed, the Scholar wint out shootin', and Rory wint wid him.—It's fond of the sport he is, Mr. O'Flanagan, as you know."

" Thru for you, ma'am ; — it's hard if I wouldn't, when I sot over him for five years and betther ; and hard it was to keep him undher ! for he was always fond o' sport."

" But not the taste o' vice in him, Phelim dear," said the mother.

" No, no, Mrs. O'More, by no manes — nothing but heart and fun in him ; but not the sign o' mischief. And why wouldn't he like to go a start with the young gintleman a-shootin' ?—the dog and the gun is tempting to man ever since the days o' Vargil himself, who says with great beauty and discrimination, Arma virumque cano ; which manes, ' Arms, men, and dogs,' which is three things that always goes together since the world began."

" Think o' that now!" said the widow : " and so Vargo used to go shootin'!"

"Not exactly, Mrs. O'More, my dear : besides, the man's name was not Vargo, but Vargil. Vargo, Mrs. O'More, manes the Vargin."

"God forgi' me!" said the widow ; "is it the blessed Vargin I said wint shootin'?" and she crossed herself.

"No, Mrs. O'More, my dear—by no manes. Vargo manes only vargin ; which is not blessed, without you join it to something else. But Vargil was the man's name ; he was a great Roman pote."

"Oh, the darlin'!" said the widow ; "and was he a Roman?"

"Not as you mane it, Mrs. O'More, my dear : he was not a good Catholic—and more's the pity, and a sore loss to him ! But he didn't know betther, for they were lost in darkness in them days, and had not the knowledge of uz. But whin I say he was a Roman, I mane he was of that famous nation—(and tarin' fellows they wor!)—Romani populi, as we say, his nativity being cast in Mantua, which is a famous port of that countrry, you persaive, Mrs. O'More."

Here Mrs. O'More dropped her ball of worsted ; and Phelim, not wishing a word of his harangue to be lost, waited till the widow was reseated and in a state of attention again.

" Mantua, I say, Mrs. O'More, a famous port of the Romani populi — the port of Mantua — which retains to this day the honour of Vargil's nativity bein' cast in that same place, you persaive, Mrs. O'More."

" Yis, yis, Mr. O'Flanagan, I'm mindin' you, sir. Oh, what a power o' larnin' you have ! Well, well, but it's wondherful ! — and sure I never heerd afore of any one bein' born in a portmantia."

" Oh ! ho, ho, ho ! Mrs. O'More ! No, my dear ma'am," said Phelim laughing, " I didn't say he was born in a portmantia : I said the port of Mantua, which was a territorial possession, or domain, as I may say, of the Romani populi, where Vargil had his nativity cast, — that is to say, was born."

" Dear, dear ! what knowledge you have, Mr. O'Flanagan !—and no wondher you'd laugh at me ! But sure, no wondher at the same time, when I thought you wor talkin' of a portmantia, that I would wondher at a child bein' sent into the world in that manner."

" Quite nath'ral, Mrs. O'More, my dear — quite nath'ral," said Phelim.

" But, can you tell me —"

" To be sure I can," said Phelim : " what is it ?"

" I mane, would you tell me, Mr. O'Flanagan, is that the place portmantias comes from ?"

" Why, indeed, Mrs. O'More, it is likely, from the derrywation, that it is : but, you see, these is small thrifles o' histhory that is not worth the while o' great min to notice ; and by raison of that same we are left to our own conjunctures in sitch matthers."

" Dear, dear ! Well—but, sir, did that gingleman you wor talkin' about go a shootin' — that Mr. Varjuice ?" —

"Vargil, Mrs. O'More—Var-gil," said Phelim with authority.

"I beg his pard'n and yours, sir."

"No offince, Mrs. O'More. Why, ma'am, as for goin' shootin', he did not—and for various raisons: guns was scarce in thim times, and gunpowdher was not in vogue, but was, by all accounts, attributed to Friar Bacon posteriorly."

"Oh, the dirty divils!" said the widow, "to fry their bacon with gunpowdher!—that bates all I ever heerd."

Phelim could not help laughing outright at the widow's mistake, and was about to explain, but she was a little annoyed at being laughed at, and Rory O'More and the Scholar, as he was called, having returned at the moment, she took the opportunity of retiring into the house, and left Phelim and his explanation and the sportsmen all together.

CHAPTER II.

SHOWING HOW A JOURNEY MAY BE PERFORMED ON A GRIDIRON WITHOUT GOING AS FAR AS ST. LAURENCE.

THE arrival of Rory O'More and the Scholar having put an end to the colloquy of the widow and Phelim O'Flanagan, the reader may as well be informed, during the pause, who the person is already designated under the title of "the Scholar."

It was some weeks before the opening of our story that Rory O'More had gone to Dublin, for the transaction of some business connected with the lease of the little farm of the widow—if the few acres she held might be dignified with that name. There was only some very subordinate person on the spot to whom any communication on the subject could be made; for the agent, following the example of the lord of the soil, was an absentee from the property as well as his employer; — the landlord residing principally in London, though deriving most of his income from Ireland, and the agent living in Dublin, making half-yearly visits to the tenantry, who never saw his face until he came to ask them for their rents. As it happened that it was in the six months' interregnum that the widow wished to arrange about her lease, she sent her son to Dublin for the purpose — “ For what’s the use,” said she, “ of talking to that fellow that’s down here, who can never give you a straight answer, but goes on with his gosher, and says he’ll write about it, and will have word for you next time; and so keeps you goin’ hither and thither, and all the time the thing is just where it was before, and never comes to anything? — So, Rory dear, in God’s name go off yourself and see the agint in Dublin, and get the rights o’ the thing out of his own mouth.” So Rory set out for Dublin, not without plenty of cautions from his mother to take care of himself in the town, for she heard it was “the dickens’ own place; and I’m towld they’re sich rogues there, that if you sleep with your mouth open, they ’ll stale the teeth out o’ your head.”

“ Faix, and maybe they’d find me like a weasel asleep,” answered Rory — “ asleep with my eyes open: and if they have such a fancy for my teeth, maybe it’s in the shape of a bite they’d get them.” For Rory had no small notion of his own sagacity.

The wonders of Dublin gave Rory, on his return, wide field for descanting upon, and made his hearers wonder in turn. But this is not the time nor place to touch on such matters. Suffice it here to say, Rory transacted his business in Dublin satisfactorily; and having done so, he mounted his outside place on one of the coaches from town, and found himself beside a slight, pale, but rather handsome young gentleman, perfectly free from anything of that repulsive bearing which sometimes too forcibly marks the distinction between the ranks of parties that may chance to meet in such promiscuous society as that which a public conveyance huddles together. He was perfectly accommodating to his fellow-travellers while they were shaking themselves down into their places, and on the journey he conversed freely with Rory on such subjects as the passing occurrences of the road suggested. This unaffected conduct won him ready esteem and liking from his humble neighbour, as in such cases it never fails to do : but its effect was heightened by the contrast which another passenger afforded, who seemed to consider it a great degradation to have a person in Rory's condition placed beside him ; and he spoke in an offensive tone of remark to the person seated at the other side, and quite loud enough to be heard, of the assurance of the lower orders, and how hard it was to make low fellows understand how to keep their distance. To all this, Rory, with a great deal of tact, never made any reply, and to a casual observer would have seemed not to notice it; but to the searching eye of his pale companion, there was the quick and momentary quiver of indignation on the peasant's lip, and the compression of brow that denotes pain and anger, the more acute from their being concealed. But an occasion soon offered for this insolent and ill-bred fellow to make an open aggression upon Rory, which our hero returned with interest. After one of the stoppages on the road for refreshment, the passengers resumed their places, and the last to make his reappearance was this bashaw. On getting up to his seat, he said, "Where's my coat?"

To this no one made any answer, and the question was soon repeated in a louder tone : "Where's my coat?"

"Your coat, is it, sir?" said the coachman.

"Yes—my coat; do you know anything of it?"

"No, sir," said the coachman : "maybe you took it into the house with you."

"No, I did not : I left it on the coach.—And by the bye," said he, looking at Rory, "you were the only person who did not quit the coach—did you take it?"

"Take what?" said Rory with a peculiar emphasis and intonation on the what.

"My coat," said the other with extreme effrontery.

"I've a coat o' my own," said Rory with great composure.

"That's not an answer to my question," said the other.

"I think you ought to be glad to get so quiet an answer," said Rory.

"I think so too," said the pale traveller.

"I did not address my conversation to you, sir," said the swaggering gentleman.

"If you did, sir, you should have been lying in the middle of the road, now," was the taunting rejoinder.

At this moment, a waiter made his appearance at the door of the inn, bearing the missing coat on his arm ; and handing it up to the owner, he said, “ You left this behind you in the parlour, sir.”

The effect was what any one must anticipate : indignant eyes were turned on all sides upon the person making so wanton an aggression, and he himself seemed to stagger under the evidence against him. He scarcely knew what to do. After much stammering, and hemming and hawing, he took the coat from the waiter, and turning to Rory, said, “ I see—I forgot — I thought that I left it on the coach ; — but—a— I see 'twas a mistake.”

“ Oh, make no apologies,” said Rory ; “ we were both undher a mistake.”

“ How both ?” said the Don.

“ Why, sir,” said Rory, “ you mistuk me for a thief, and I mistuk you for a gintleman.”

The swaggerer could not rally against the laugh this bitter repartee made against him, and he was effectually silenced for the rest of the journey.

Indeed, the conversation soon slackened on all sides, for it began to rain: and it may be remarked, that under such circumstances travellers wrap up their minds and bodies at the same time; and once a man draws his nose inside the collar of his great-coat, it must be something much above the average of stage-coach pleasantry which will make him poke it out again — and spirits invariably fall as umbrellas rise.

But neither great-coats nor umbrellas were long proof against the torrents that soon fell, for these were not the days of Macintosh and India rubber.

Have you ever remarked, that on a sudden dash of rain the coachman immediately begins to whip his horses? So it was on the present occasion; and the more it rained, the faster he drove. Splash they went through thick and thin, as if velocity could have done them any good; and the rain, one might have thought, was vying with the coachman,—for the faster he drove, the faster it seemed to rain.

At last the passengers seated on the top began to feel their seats invaded by the flood that deluged the roof of the coach, just as they entered a town where there was change of horses to be made. The moment the coach stopped, Rory O'More jumped off, and said to the coachman, "I'll be back with you before you go;—but don't start before I come :" and away he ran down the town.

"Faix, that's a sure way of being back before I go!" said the driver: "but you'd betther not delay, my buck, or it's behind I'll lave you."

While change was being made, the passengers endeavoured to procure wads of straw to sit upon, for the wet became more and more inconvenient; and at last all was ready for starting, and Rory had not yet returned. The horn was blown, and the coachman's patience was just worn out, when Rory hove in sight, splashing his way through the middle of the street, flourishing two gridirons over his head.

"Here I am," said he, panting and nearly exhausted : "'faith, I'd a brave run for it !'"

"Why, thin, what the dickens do you want here with gridirons ?" said the coachman.

"Oh, never mind," said Rory ; "jist give me a wisp o' sthraw, and God bless you," said he to one of the helpers who was standing by ; and having got it, he scrambled up the coach, and said to his pale friend, "Now, sir, we'll be comfortable."

"I don't see much likelihood of it," said his fellow-traveller.

"Why, look what I've got for you," said Rory.

"Oh, that straw will soon be sopped with rain, and then we'll be as badly off as before."

"But it's not on sthraw I'm depindin'," said Rory ; "look at this !" and he brandished one of the gridirons.

"I have heard of stopping the tide with a pitchfork," said the traveller, smiling, "but never of keeping out rain with a gridiron."

"Faith, thin, I'll show you how to do that same," said Rory. "Here—sit up—clap this gridiron undher you, and you'll be undher wather no longer. Stop, sir, stay a minit—don't sit down on the bare bars, and be makin' a beefstake o' yourself; here's a wisp o' sthraw to put betune you and the cowld iron—and not a dhryer sate in all Ireland than the same gridiron."

The young traveller obeyed, and while he admired the ingenuity, could not help laughing at the whimsicality of the contrivance.

"You see I've another for myself," said Rory, seating himself in a similar manner on his second gridiron: "and now," added he, "as far as the sates is consarned, it may rain till doomsday."

Away went the coach again; and for some time after resuming the journey, the young traveller was revolving the oddity of the fore-going incident in his mind, and led by his train of thought to the consideration of national characteristics, he came to the conclusion that an Irishman was the only man under the sun who could have hit upon so strange an expedient for relieving them from their difficulty. He was struck not only by the originality of the design and the promptness of the execution, but also by the good-nature of his companion in thinking of him on the occasion. After these conclusions had passed through his own mind, he turned to Rory, and said,

“ What was it made you think of a grid-iron ?”

“ Why, thin, I ’ll tell you,” said Rory. “ I promised my mother to bring a present to the priest from Dublin, and I could not make up my mind rightly what to get all the time I was there. I thought of a pair o’ top-boots ; for indeed, his reverence’s is none of the best, and only you know them to be top-boots, you would not take them to be top-boots, bekase the bottoms has been put in so often that the tops is wore out intirely, and is no more like top-boots than my brogues. So I wint to a shop in Dublin, and picked out the purtiest pair o' top-boots I could see;—whin I say purty, I don't mane a flourishin' 'taarin' pair, but sitch as was fit for a priest, a respectable pair o' boots;—and with that, I pulled out my good money to pay for them, whin jist at that minit, remembering the thricks o' the town, I be-thought o' myself, and says I, 'I suppose these are the right thing?' says I to the man.—' You can thry them,' says he.—' How can I thry them?' says I.—' Pull them on you,' says he.—' Throth, an' I'd be sorry,' says I, 'to take sitch a liberty with thim,' says I.—' Why, aren't you goin' to ware them?' says he.—' Is it me?' says I. ' Me ware top-boots? Do you think it's takin' lave of my sinses I am?' says I.—' Then what do you want to buy them for?' says he.—' For his reverence, Father Kinshela,' says I. ' Are they the right sort for him?'—' How should I know?' says he.—' You're a purty boot-maker,' says I, ' not to know how to make a priest's boot!'—' How do I know his size?' says he.—' Oh, don't be comin' off that a-way,' says I. 'There's no sitch great differ betune priests and other min!'"

"I think you were very right there," said the pale traveller.

"To be sure, sir," said Rory; "and it was only jist a come off for his own ignorance.—'Tell me his size,' says the fellow, 'and I'll fit him.'—'He's betune five and six fut,' says I.—'Most men are,' says he, laughin' at me. He was an impidint fellow.—'It's not the five, nor six, but his two feet I want to know the size of,' says he. So I persaived he was jeerin' me, and says I, 'Why, thin, you disrespectful vagabone o' the world, you Dublin jackeen! do you mane to insinivate that Father Kinshela ever wint barefutted in his life, that I could know the size of his fut,' says I; and with that I threw the boots in his face. 'Take that,' says I, 'you dirty thief o' the world! you impidint vagabone of the world! you ignorant citizen o' the world!' And with that I left the place!"

The traveller laughed outright at the absurdity of Rory's expectation that well-fitting boots for all persons were to be made by intuition.

"Faith, I thought it would plaze you," said Rory. "Don't you think I serv'd him right?"

"You astonished him, I dare say."

"I'll engage I did. Wanting to humbug me that way, taking me for a nath'ral bekase I come from the counthry!"

"Oh, I'm not sure of that," said the traveller. "It is their usual practice to take measure of their customers."

"Is it, thin?"

"It really is."

"See that, now!" said Rory with an air of triumph. "You would think that they wor cleverer in the town than in the counthry; and they ought to be so, by all accounts;—but in the regard of what I towld you, you see, we're before them intirely."

"How so?" said the traveller.

"Arrah ! bekase they never throuble people in the counthry at all with takin' their measure; but you jist go to a fair, and bring your fut along with you, and somebody else dhrives a cartful o' brogues into the place, and there you sarve yourself ; and so the man gets his money and you get your shoes, and every one 's plazed. Now, isn't that betther than sitch botches as them in Dublin, that must have the measure, and keep you waitin' ? while in the counthry there 's no delay in life, but it 's jist down with your money and off with your brogues !"

"On with your brogues, you mean ?" said the traveller.

"No, indeed, now !" said Rory ; "you 're out there. Sure we wouldn't be so wasteful as to put on a bran new pair o' brogues to go lickin' the road home ? — no, in throth ; we keep them for the next dance we 're goin' to, or maybe to go to chapel of a Sunday."

"And if you don't put them on, how can you tell they fit you ?"

"Oh, they 're all alike !"

" But what would you do, when you wanted to go to your dance, if you found your brogues were too small ?"

" Oh, that niver happens. They 're all fine aisy shoes."

" Well, but if they prove too easy ?"

" That 's aisy cured," said Rory : " stuff a thrifle o' hay into them, like the Mullingar heifers."

" Mullingar heifers !" said the traveller, rather surprised by the oddity of the expression.

" Yes, sir," said Rory ; " did you niver hear of the Mullingar heifers ?"

" Never."

" Why, you see, sir, the women in Westmeath, they say, is thick in the legs, God help them, the craythurs ! and so there 's a saying again thim, ' You 're beef to the heels, like a Mullingar heifer.' "

" Oh ! I perceive."

" Yes, sir, and it 's all on account of what I towld you about the hay."

"How?" said the traveller.

"Why, there's an owld joke you may take a turn out of, if you like, whin you see a girl that's thick in the fetlock — you call afther her and say, 'Young woman!' She turns round, and then says you, 'I beg your pardon, ma'am, but I think you're used to wear hay in your shoes.' Thin, if she's innocent, she'll ask 'Why?' — and thin you'll say, 'Be-kase the calves has run down your legs to get at it."

"I see," said the stranger ; "that is, if she's innocent."

"Yis, sir — simple I mane ; but that seldom happens, for they're commonly up to you, and 'cute enough."

"Now, in case she's not innocent, as you say?" said the traveller.

"Faith ! maybe it's a sharp answer you'll get thin, or none. It's as like as not she may say, 'Thank'ee, young man, my calf doesn't like hay, and so you're welkim to it yourself."

"But all this time," said the traveller, "you have not told me of your reasons for getting the gridirons."

"Oh! wait a bit," said Rory; "sure it's that I'm comin' to. Where's this I was?"

"You were running down the Mullingar girls' legs," said the traveller.

"I see you're sharp at an answer yourself, sir," said Rory. "But what I mane is, where did I lave off tellin' you about the present for the priest?—wasn't it at the bootmaker's shop? — yes, that was it. Well, sir, on laving the shop, as soon as I kem to myself afther the fellow's impidince, I begun to think what was the next best thing I could get for his reverence; and with that, while I was thinkin' about it, I seen a very respectable owld gintleman goin' by, with the most beautiful stick in his hand I ever set my eyes on, and a goolden head to it that was worth its weight in goold; and it gev him such an iligant look altogether, that says I to myself, 'It's the very thing for Father Kinshela, if I could get sitch another.' And so I wint lookin' about me every shop I seen as I wint by, and at last, in a sthreet they call Dame Sthreet—and, by the same token, I didn't know why they called it Dame Sthreet till I ax'd ; and I was towld they called it Dame Sthreet bekase the ladies were so fond o' walkin' there ;—and lovely craythurs they wor ! and I can't b'lieve that the town is such an onwhole-some place to live in, for most o' the ladies I seen there had the most beautiful rosy cheeks I ever clapt my eyes upon — and the beautiful rowlin' eyes o' them ! Well, it was in Dame Sthreet, as I was sayin', that I kem to a shop where there was a power o' sticks, and so I wint in and looked at thim ; and a man in the place kem to me and ax'd me if I wanted a cane ? ‘ No,’ says I, ‘ I don't want a cane ; it's a stick I want,’ says I. ‘ A cane, you mane,’ says he. ‘ No,’ says I, ‘ it 's a stick ’— for I was detarmined to have no cane, but to stick to the stick. ‘ Here 's a nate one,’ says he. ‘ I don't want a nate one,’ says I, ‘ but a responsible one,’ says I. ‘ Faith !’ says he, ‘ if an Irishman's stick was responsible, it would have a great dale to answer for'—and he laughed a power. I didn't know myself what he meant, but that's what he said."

"It was because you asked for a responsible stick," said the traveller.

"And why wouldn't I," said Róry, "when it was for his reverence I wanted it? Why wouldn't he have a nice-lookin', respectable,* responsible stick?"

"Certainly," said the traveller.

"Well, I picked out one that looked to my likin'—a good substantial stick, with an ivory top to it—for I seen that the goold-headed ones was so dear I couldn't come up to them; and so says I, 'Give me a howld o' that,' says I—and I tuk a grip iv it. I never was so surprised in my life. I thought to get a good, brave handful of a solid stick, but, my dear, it was well it didn't fly out o' my hand a'most, it was so light. 'Phew!' says I, 'what sort of a stick is this?' 'I tell you it's not a stick, but a cane,' says he. "'Faith ! I b'lieve you,' says I. ' You see how good and light it is,' says he. Think o' that, sir ! — to call a stick good and light — as if there could be any good in life in a stick that wasn't heavy, and could sthreck a good blow ! ' Is it jokin' you are ?' says I. ' Don't you feel it yourself ?' says he. ' Throth, I can hardly feel it at all,' says I. ' Sure that's the beauty of it,' says he. Think o' the ignorant vagabone ! — to call a stick a beauty that was as light a'most as a bulrush ! ' And so you can hardly feel it !' says he, grinnin'. ' Yis, indeed,' says I ; ' and what's worse, I don't think I could make any one else feel it either.' ' Oh ! you want a stick to bate people with !' says he. ' To be sure,' says I ; ' sure that's the use of a stick.' ' To knock the sineses out o' people !' says he, grinnin' again. ' Sartinly,' says I, ' if they're saucy' — lookin' hard at him at the same time. ' Well, these is only walkin'-sticks,' says he. ' Throth, you may say runnin'-sticks,' says I, ' for you daren't stand before any one with sich a thraneen as that in your fist.' ‘ Well, pick out the heaviest o’ them you plaze,’ says he; ‘ take your choice.’ So I wint pokin’ and rummagin’ among thim, and, if you believe me, there wasn’t a stick in their whole shop worth a kick in the shins—divil a one !”

* Responsible is always applied by the Irish peasantry in the sense of respectable.

“ But why did you require such a heavy stick for the priest ?”

“ Bekase there is not a man in the parish wants it more,” said Rory.

“ Is he so quarrelsome, then ?” asked the traveller.

“ No, but the greatest o’ pacemakers,” said Rory.

“ Then what does he want the heavy stick for ?”

“ For wallopin’ his flock, to be sure,” said Rory.

“ Walloping !” said the traveller, choking with laughter.

“ Oh ! you may laugh,” said Rory; “ but, ‘pon my sowl ! you wouldn’t laugh if you wor undher his hand, for he has a brave heavy one, God bless him and spare him to us !”

“ And what is all this walloping for ?”

“ Why, sir, whin we have a bit of a fight, for fun, or the regular faction one, at the fair, his reverence sometimes hears of it, and comes av coarse.”

“ Good God !” said the traveller in real astonishment, “ does the priest join the battle ?”

“ No, no, no, sir ! I see you're quite a stranger in the counthry. The priest join it ! — Oh ! by no manes. But he comes and stops it ; and, av coarse, the only way he can stop it is, to ride into thim, and wallop thim all round before him, and disperse thim — scatther thim like chaff before the wind ; and it 's the best o' sticks he requires for that same.”

“ But might he not have his heavy stick on purpose for that service, and make use of a lighter one on other occasions ?”

“ As for that matther, sir,” said Rory,

"there's no knowin' the minit he might want it, for he is often necessiated to have recourse to it. It might be, going through the village, the public-house is too full, and in he goes and drives them out. Oh ! it would delight your heart to see the style he clears a public-house in, in no time !"

"But wouldn't his speaking to them answer the purpose as well ?"

"Oh no ! he doesn't like to throw away his discourse on them ; and why should he ? — he keeps that for the blessed althar on Sunday, which is a fitter place for it : besides, he does not like to be sevare on us."

"Severe !" said the traveller in surprise ; "why, haven't you said that he thrashes you round on all occasions ?"

"Yis, sir ; but what o' that ? — sure that's nothin' to histongue—his words is like swoords or razhors, I may say : we're used to a lick of a stick every day, but not to sich language as his reverence sometimes murthers us with whin we displaze him. Oh ! it's terrible, so it is, to have the weight of his tongue on you ! Throth ! I 'd rather let him bate me from this till to-morrow, than have one angry word from him."

" I see, then, he must have a heavy stick," said the traveller.

" To be sure he must, sir, at all times ; and that was the raison I was so particular in the shop ; and afther spendin' over an hour—would you b'lieve it ? — divil a stick I could get in the place fit for a child, much less a man — all poor contemptible things ; and so the man I was talkin' to says to me at last, ' It 's odd that in all these sticks there is not one to plaze you.' ' You know nothin' about it,' says I. ' You 'd betther be off, and take up no more o' my time,' says he. ' As for your time,' says I, ' I 'd be sorry to idle anybody ; but in the regard of knowin' a stick, I 'll give up to no man,' says I. ' Look at that !' says I, howldin' up my own purty bit o' blackthorn I had in my fist. ' Would you compare your owld batther'd stick,' says he, — (there was a few chips out of it, for it is an owld friend, as you may see,) — ‘would you compare it,’ says he, ‘to this?’ — howldin’ up one of his bulrushes. ‘By gor,’ says I, ‘if you like to thry a turn with me, I ’ll let you know which is the best !’ says I. ‘You know nothin’ about it,’ says he —‘this is the best o’ sugar canes.’ ‘By my sowl, thin !’ says I, ‘you ’ll get no sugar out o’ this, I promise you! — but at the same time, the divil a sweeter bit o’ timber in the wide world than the same black-thorn — and if you ’d like to taste it you may thry.’ ‘No,’ says he ; ‘I’m no happy cure,’ — (or somethin’ he said about cure.) ‘Thin if you’re not aisy to cure,’ says I, ‘you ’d better not fight ;’ which is thtrue — and some men is unwholesome, and mustn’t fight by raison of it — and, indeed, it ’s a great loss to a man who hasn’t flesh that ’s aisy to hale.”

“ I ’m sure of it,” said the traveller. “ But about the gridiron ?”

“ Sure I ’m tellin’ you about it,” said Rory ;

"only I'm not come to it yet. " You see," continued he, " I was so disgusted with them shopkeepers in Dublin, that my heart was fairly broke with their ignorance, and I seen they knew nothin' at all about what I wanted, and so I came away without anything for his reverence, though it was on my mind all this day on the road; and comin' through the last town in the middle o' the rain, I thought of a gridiron."

"A very natural thing to think of in a shower of rain," said the traveller.

"No, 't wasn't the rain made me think of it—I think it was God put a gridiron in my heart, seein' that it was a present for the priest I intended ; and when I thought of it, it came into my head, afther, that it would be a fine thing to sit on, for to keep one out of the rain, that was ruinatin' my cordheroys on the top o' the coach; so I kept my eye out as we dhrove along up the sthreet, and sure enough what should I see at a shop half way down the town but a gridiron hanging up at the door !

and so I went back to get it."

" But isn't a gridiron an odd present ? — hasn't his reverence one already ?"

" He had, sir, before it was bruk,— but that 's what I remembered, for I happened to be up at his place one day, sittin' in the kitchen, when Molly was brilin' some mate an it for his reverence ; and while she jist turned about to get a pinch o' salt to shake over it, the dog that was in the place made a dart at the gridiron on the fire, and threwn it down, and up he whips the mate, before one of us could stop him. With that Molly whips up the gridiron, and says she, ' Bad luck to you, you disrespectful baste ! would nothin' sarve you but the priest's dinner ?'
and she made a crack o' the gridiron at him.
' As you have the mate, you shall have the gridiron too,' says she ; and with that she gave him such a rap on the head with it, that the bars flew out of it, and his head went through it, and away he pulled it out of her hands, and ran off with the gridiron hangin' round his neck like a necklace — and he went mad a'most with it; for though a kettle to a dog's tail is nath'rel, a gridiron round his neck is very surprisin' to him; and away he tatthered over the counthry, till there wasn't a taste o' the gridiron left together."

" So you thought of supplying its place?" said the traveller.

" Yes, sir," said Rory. " I don't think I could do betther."

" But what did you get two for?" said the traveller.

" Why, sir, when I thought of how good a sate it would make, I thought of you at the same time."

" That was very kind of you," said the traveller, " more particularly as I have done nothing to deserve such attention."

" You'll excuse me there, sir, if you plaze," said Rory ; " you behaved to me, sir, like a gintleman, and the word of civility is never thrown away."

" Every gentleman, I hope," said the traveller, " would do the same."

" Every rule gintleman, certainly," said Rory, — " but there's many o' them that calls themselves gintlemen that doesn't do the like, and it's the stiff word they have for us, and the hard word maybe—and they think good clothes makes all the differ, jist as if a man hadn't a heart undher a frieze coat."

" I 'm sorry to hear it," said the traveller ; " but I hope such conduct is not common."

" Throth there's more of it than there ought to be," said Rory. " But thim that is the contrairy is never losers by it—and so by me and you, sir,—and sure it's a dirty dog I'd be, to see the gintleman beside me sittin' in wet, that gave me a share of his paraplew, and the civil word, that is worth more—for the hardest rain only wets the body, but the hard word cuts the heart.'

"I have reason to be obliged to you," said the traveller, "and I assure you I am so; but I should like to know what you'll do with the second gridiron."

"Oh, I'll engage I'll find use for it," said Rory.

"Why, indeed," said the traveller, "from the example you have given of your readiness of invention, I should not doubt that you will,—for certainly, you have made, on the present occasion, a most original application of the utensil."

"Faith, I daur say," said Rory, "we are the first mortials wor ever on a gridiron."

"Since the days of Saint Laurence," said the traveller.

"Why, used Saint Larrance, God bless him! sit on a gridiron?" said Rory.

"No," said the traveller; "but he was broiled upon one."

"Oh the thieves o' the world to brile him!—and did they ate him afther, sir?"

"No, no," said the traveller,—"they only broiled him. But I thought you good Catholics all knew about the martyrs?"

" And so we do, sir, mostly ; — but I never heerd of Saint Larrance afore ; or if I did, I'm disremembered of it."

" But you do know about most of them, you say ?"

" Oh ! sartinly, sir. Sure I often heerd how Saint Stephen was hunted up and down ; which is the raison we begin to hunt always on Saint Stephen's Day."

" You forget there, too," said the traveller : " Saint Stephen was stoned."

" To be sure, sir,—sure I know he was : didn't I say they run afther him throwin' stones at him, the blackguards ! till they killed him—huntin' him for his life ?—Oh, thin but wasn't it a cruel thing to be a saint in thim haythen times, to be runnin' the world over, the poor marchers, as they might well be called ?"

" Yes," said the traveller ; " those were days of trial to the saints."

" 'Faith, I go bail they never gave them any thrial at all," said Rory, " but jist murthered them without judge or jury, the vagabones!—though, indeed, for the matther o' that, neither judge or jury will do a man much good while there's false witnesses to be had to swear what they're paid for, and maybe the jury and the judge only too ready to b'lieve them; and maybe a boy is hanged in their own minds before he's put on his thrial at all, unless he has a good friend in some great man who doesn't choose to let him die."

" Is it possible," asked the traveller, " that they manage matters here in this way?"

" To be sure they do, sir;—and why wouldn't a gintleman take care of his people if it was plazin' to him?"

" It is the laws and not the gentleman should be held in respect," said the traveller: " the poor man's life should never depend upon the rich man's pleasure."

CHAPTER III.

A PEEP INTO IRELAND FORTY YEARS AGO.—HINTS FOR CHARGING JURIES.—EVERY LANDLORD HIS OWN LAW-GIVER.—PRIDE OF BIRTH.—A JOCULAR PRINCE ON FOOT, AND A POPULAR PEER ON HORSEBACK.

A TRAIN of musing, on the traveller's part, rapidly succeeded his last remark; and as he went jolting along unconsciously over the wretched road, he was mentally floundering through the deep ruts of political speculation, and looking forward, through the warm haze which a young imagination flings round its objects, to that happier time when Ireland should enjoy a loftier position than that implied by what Rory O'More had said. But, alas! instead of this brilliant advent, blood and crime, and all the fiercer passions that degrade human nature, making man more like a demon than a human being, were the futurity which Ireland was doomed to experience ; and while the enthusiasm of the young traveller looked forward to the heights where his imagination enthroned his country's fortunes, he overlooked and saw not the valley of blood that lay between.

And forty years (almost half a century) have passed away since the young enthusiast indulged in his vision, and still is Ireland the theme of fierce discussion.

It was Rory O'More's remark upon the nature of judicial trials in Ireland that had started the traveller on his train of musing. An Irishman by birth, he had long been absent from his native land, and was not aware of its internal details ; and that such a state of feudality as that implied by Rory's observation could exist in Ireland, while England enjoyed the fullest measure of her constitution, might well surprise him :—but so it was.

The period to which this relates was 1797, when distrust, political prejudice, and religious rancour, were the terrible triumvirate that assumed dominion over men's minds. In such a state of things, the temple of justice could scarcely be called a sanctuary, and shelter was to be found rather beneath the mantle of personal influence than under the ermine of the judge. Even to this day, in Ireland, feudal influence is in existence; but forty years ago, it superseded the laws of the land.

So much was this the case, that it is worth recording an anecdote of the period which is fact: the names it is unnecessary to give.

A certain instance of brutal assault, causing loss of life, had occurred, so aggravated in its character that the case almost amounted to murder, and the offender, who stood his trial for the offence, it was expected, would be sentenced to transportation, should he escape the forfeiture of his life to the law. The evidence on his trial was clear and convincing, and all attempts at defence had failed, and the persons assembled in the court anticipated a verdict of guilty on the heaviest counts in the indictment. The prosecution and defence had closed, and the judge had nearly summed up the evidence, and was charging the jury directly against the prisoner, when a bustle was perceived in the body of the court. The judge ordered the crier to command silence, and that officer obeyed his commands without producing any effect. The judge was about to direct a second and more peremptory command for silence, when a note was handed up to the bench, and the judge himself, instead of issuing his command for silence, became silent himself, and perused the note with great attention. He pursued his charge to the jury no further, but sent up a small slip of paper to the foreman, who forthwith held some whispered counsel with his brother jurors ; and when their heads, that had been huddled together in consultation, separated, and they resumed their former positions, the judge then continued his address to them thus. —

“ I have endeavoured to point out to you, gentlemen of the jury, the doubts of this case, but I do not think it necessary to proceed any further ; — I have such confidence in your discrimination and good sense, that I now leave the case entirely in your hands : — if you are of opinion that what you have been put in possession of in the prisoner's favour counter-balances the facts sworn to against him, you will of course acquit him — and any doubts you have, I need not tell you should be thrown into the scale of mercy. It is the proud pre-eminence, gentlemen, of our criminal laws — laws, gentlemen, which are part and parcel of the glorious constitution, that is the wonder and the envy of surrounding nations, that a prisoner is to have the benefit of every doubt ; and therefore, if you think proper, of course you will find the prisoner NOT guilty."

" Certainly, my lord," said the foreman of the jury, " we are of your lordship's opinion, and we say NOT GUILTY."

The fact was, the great man of the district where the crime had been committed, whose serf the prisoner was, had sent up his compliments to the judge and jury, stating the prisoner to be a most useful person to him, and that he would feel extremely obliged if they would acquit him. This ruffian was a sort of bold, sporting, dare-devil character, whose services in breaking-in dogs, and attending his master and his parties on wild mountain-shooting and fishing excursions, were invaluable to the squire, and human life, which this fellow had sacrificed, was nothing in the scale when weighed against the squire's diversion. This will scarcely be credited in the present day, nevertheless it is a fact.

Another occurrence of the time shows the same disregard of the law; though the case is by no means so bad, inasmuch as the man was only taken up for an offence, but was not tried—he was only rescued to save him that trouble. He had committed some offence which entitled him to a lodging in the county gaol, and was accordingly taken into custody by the proper authorities; but, as the county town was too distant to send him to at once, he was handed over to the care of a military detachment that occupied a small village in the neighbourhood. To the little barrack-yard or guard-house of this outpost he was committed ; but he did not remain there long, for his mountain friends came down in great numbers and carried him off in triumph, having forced the barracks. The moment the colonel of the regiment, a detachment of which occupied the post, received intelligence of the circumstance, he marched the greater part of his men to the place, vowing he would drag the prisoner who had been committed to the care of his troops from the very heart of his mountains, and that neither man, woman, nor child should be spared who dared to protect him from capture. While the colonel, who was an Englishman, was foaming with indignation at this contempt of all order displayed by the Irish, Mr. French waited upon him and asked him to dinner. The English colonel said, he would be most happy at any other time, but at present it was impossible ; — that if he could, he would neither eat, drink, nor sleep till he had vindicated the laws.

"Pooh, pooh ! My dear sir," said Mr. French, "it is all very well to talk about the laws in England, but they know nothing about them here."

"Then it's time, sir, they should be taught," said the colonel.

"Well, don't be in a hurry, at least, my dear sir," said Mr. French. "I assure you the poor people mean no disrespect to the laws; it is in pure ignorance they have made this mistake."

"Mistake!" said the colonel.

"'Pon my soul ! nothing more," said Mr. French ; "and if you think to make them wise at the point of the bayonet, you'll find yourself mistaken : you'll have the whole country in an uproar, and do no good after all ; for once these fellows have given you the slip, you might as well go hunt after mountain-goats."

"But, consistently with my duty, sir—"

“Your duty will keep till to-morrow, colonel dear, and you'll meet three or four other magistrates, as well as me, at my house, who will tell you the same that I have done. You'll be wiser to-morrow, depend upon it:—so come home with me to dinner.”

The colonel, who was a man of deliberation, rode home with Mr. French, who talked him over as they went along:—“You see, my dear sir, how is it possible you should know the people as well as we do? Believe me, every landlord knows his own tenantry best, and we make it a point here never to interfere with each other in that particular. Now, the fellow they took away from your men——”

“Curse them!” said the colonel.

“Keep yourself cool, my dear colonel. That fellow, for instance — now he is one of Blake's men: and if Blake wants the fellow to be hanged, he'll send him in to you.”

“Send him in! — why, sir, if my regiment could not keep the rascal, what chance has Mr. Blake of making him prisoner?”

"I said nothing, colonel, of making him prisoner: I said, and still say, that if Blake wants him to be hanged, he 'll send him in."

"Do you mean to say, my good sir, that he 'll desire him to come in and be hanged?"

"Precisely."

"And will he come?"

"Most undoubtedly, if Blake desires him."

The colonel dined with Mr. French that day: the day following the regiment was marched back to head-quarters — and Blake did not send in his man to be hanged. So much for feudalism!

But the young traveller knew not these facts, and he was awakened from the reverie in which he was indulging by the blowing of a long tin horn, announcing the arrival of the coach at a dirty little town, where it was to stop for the night. It drove up to what was called a hotel, round the door of which, though still raining heavily, a crowd of beggars stood, so thick, that the passengers could hardly press their way through them into the house ; and while they were thus struggling for admittance, obstreperous prayers assailed their ears on all sides, in horrid discord and strange variety—for their complaints and their blessings became so jumbled together as to produce a ludicrous effect. There were blind and lame, broken bones, widows and orphans, &c. &c.

“ Pity the blind ! and may you never see—”

“ To-morrow morning won’t find me alive if you don’t relieve—”

“ The guard will give me something, your honour, if you ’ll only bid him—”

“ Be quiet, you devil ! and don’t taze the gintleman ! Sure he has—”

“ Three fatherless childher—”

“ And broke his two legs—”

“ That is stone blind—”

“ And met a dhreadful accident !—and sure the house fell on him, and he’s lyin’ undher it these three weeks without a bit to ate, but—”

“ Three fatherless childher and a dissolute widow—”

"Lying on the broad of her back, with nothing on her but—"

"The small-pox, your honour!"

"For Heaven's sake! let me pass," said the young traveller, who had a horror of the small-pox; and pressing through the crowd that environed him into the house, he entered the first room he saw, and suddenly closed the door behind him.

As soon, however, as he recovered his first alarm at the mention of the terrible disease he so much dreaded, he called for the waiter and made inquiries for Rory. Finding he was in the house, he sent him a message to say he would be glad to see him; and on Rory making his appearance, he requested him to be seated, and asked him would he have something to drink?

Rory declined it, until the traveller said that he himself would join him in a potation after their wetting; and when Rory understood that the traveller meant they should sit down together over their glasses, he accepted the offer with modest thankfulness, and expressed his acknowledgment for the honour done him by his travelling companion.

In the course of their conversation, the young traveller found, that with all the apparent simplicity of Rory, he was not deficient in intelligence, and that the oddity of the incidents in which he had described himself as being an actor arose more from the novelty of his position in a large city than in any inherent stupidity. He became possessed of his name also, and Rory could not help showing his pride in having one so good; for while he affected to laugh at his proud descent, it was quite clear he had a firm belief in it.

"I suppose, sir, you have heerd tell of one Rory O'More in the owld times?"

"Yes,—King of Leinster, you mean."

"So they say, sir,—that he and his people before him wor kings time out o' mind, until bad fortune came to thim and they went to the bad entirely; and the English dhruv thim out, bekaze they had a way of puttin' between people; and while they were squabblin' one with the other, the English used to come in and do them both out — like the owld story of the lawyer and the oysthers. Well, when once they were dhruv out, they went witherin' and dwindlelin' down by degrees, and at last they hadn't a fut of land left them, nor even a house over their heads, and so we wor reduced that way, sir."

"Then you consider yourself the descendant of the O'More?" said the traveller.

"Throth, sir, and they say that we are the owld O'Mores — but sure I laugh at it."

"But wouldn't you be angry if any one else laughed at it?"

"I dunna but I might," said Rory, with much ingenuousness.

"And why do you laugh at it then?"

"Why, afther all, sir, sure it's quare enough for a man to be talkin' of his great relations that was formerly, when at this present he is only a poor workin' man ; and if I was ever so much the thtrue discindant of Rory O'More, sure I can't forget what I am now."

" You may be the representative of the house for all that," said the traveller.

" Oh ! as for the house," said Rory, " 'pon my sowl ! there 's a cruel differ there betune us : the right Rory O'More lived in Duna-maise — that was something like a house ! and I have only a poor cabin to live in."

" But still you may be the true descendant of the right Rory, as you call him," said the traveller, who wished to probe the feelings of the peasant on this subject, and discover how far the pride of birth could survive loss of station : and he was pleased to discover (for he was himself of high descent) that ages of misfortune could not extinguish the fire of a proud race ; and he more than ever felt the truth of the observation, that it is only they who have no ancestry to boast of who affect to despise it.

To such as these, or those to whom ancestral power as well as name has descended,—or to the many who take no pleasure in tracing to their secret sources the springs of action and feeling in the human mind and heart,—it may seem incredible that a poor peasant could retain the pride of birth when all its substantial appendages were gone:—yet so it was. But it was a pride that was unobtrusive. Circumstances had modified and moulded it to the necessities of the peasant's station: he was respectful in his demeanour to all whose position in society was better than his own, conscious though he might be of their inferior blood; and while he took off his hat to some wealthy plebeian, he never considered the blood of the O'Mores to be degraded. The fallen fortunes of his house were not a subject of personal regret to him; it was in a national point of view they were lamented. That Ireland had lost her King of Leinster he considered a misfortune; but he never for a moment regretted that he, his heir, as he believed himself to be, (and perhaps was,) was obliged to eat potatoes and salt.

But of the fair fame of the O'More he was as jealous as their founder, and insult, in the remotest degree, roused the latent feelings of family pride in his bosom. Not the great Rory himself, perched on his castled crag of Dunamaise, could be more jealous of the honour of his house than his humble namesake in his thatched cabin.

The young traveller, it has been already said, took pleasure in making manifest this feeling of our hero ; and in doing so, he found that Rory had a provincial as well as personal pride of ancestry. The south, Rory protested, “ bet all Ireland in the regard of high blood.”

“ They have good blood in the north, too,” said the traveller.

“ Oh, they may have a thrifle of it ; but it's not of the rale owld sort—nothing to compare with us.”

“ Do you forget the O'Neil ?” said the traveller.

"Oh, that's good, I don't deny," said Rory —"but one swallow makes no summer."

"But I can count more than one," said the traveller: "there's Talbot, De Lacy, Fitzgerald—"

"Oh, murther! murther! sir! — sure thim is only invadheres, and not the owld Irish at all. You would never compare thim with the O'Mores, the O'Dempsys, the O'Connells, the O'Donaghues, the O'Shaughnessys!"

"Stop, stop!" said the traveller, who did not know to what length this bead-roll of O's might extend; "you forget that the head of the Fitzgeralds is Duke of Leinster."

"But O'More was King of Leinsther, sir, if you plaze."

"Very true, Rory; but still the Geraldines are a noble race."

"Who are they, sir?"

"The Fitzgeralds."

"Oh, the Juke o' Leinsther you mane, is it?"

"Yes."

"Faith thin, to show you, sir, how little we think o' them down in the south, I'll tell you something that I know is a thruth, bekaze I had it from O'Dempsey himself, who played the thrick an the juke, and said the thing to him ; for he's a comical blade."

"Well, what is it?"

"Why, you see, sir, O'Dempsey was comin' home from Dublin, and the money was gettin' fine-drawn with him, and he wanted to see if he had enough left to pay for the coach home ; and, by dad ! the change was so scarce that he was obliged to hunt it up in his pocket into the corner, like a contrary cowl, before he could lay howld of it at all ; and when he did get it into the pawm of his fist, it was a'most ashamed to see the light, it looked so contemptible ; and my bowld O'Dempsey seen the coach was out o' the question, or even a lift in the canal-boat, and so he put his thrust in Providence, and took a big dhrink that night to sthrengthen him for the mornin' ; and the next day off he set home, with a short stick in his hand and a pair o' good legs undher him; and he met nothin' remarkable antil he came to betune Kileock and Maynooth; and it was thin that he heerd the thramp of horses gallopin' afther him, and he turned round and seen three gintlemen comin' up in great style: one o' them, a fine full handsome man, the picthur of a gentleman, and a fine baste undher him, and the gentlemin along with him very nice too; one in particular, a smart nate-made man, with a fine bright eye and a smilin' face, and a green handkicher round his neck, and a sportin' aisly sate on his horse; and Dempsey heerd him say, as they dhrew up jist behind him, ‘Look what a fine step that fellow has!’ (manin’ O’Dempsy; and, indeed, a claner boy isn’t in all Ireland than himself, and can walk with any man). So when they came up to him, the small gentleman said, ‘God save you! ’ ‘God save you kindly, sir! ’ says O’Dempsy. ‘ You don’t let the grass grow undher your feet, my man,’ says the gintleman. ‘Nor corn neither, sir,’ says Dempsey. ‘So I see by the free step you have,’ says the gintleman, laughin’; and the others laughed too, the full gintleman in particular; and says he, ‘Well, Ned, you got your answer.’

“Now the minit that O’Dempsy heerd the word ‘Ned,’ and it bein’ in the neighbourhood o’ Cartown, which is the Juke o’ Leinsther’s place, the thought jumped into his head that it was Lord Edward Fitzjaral’ was in it; for he always heerd he was small, and handsome, and merry, and that the juke his brother was a fine-lookin’ man: and so with that he made cock-sure in his own mind that the full gintleman was the Juke o’ Leinsther, and the little one Lord Edward. So hearin’ that Lord Edward liked a joke, O’Dempsy never let on to suspect who they wor, and they walked along beside him, and had a great dale o’ discourse and jokin’, and the answers passin’ betune them as fast as hops. At last says the juke, (for it was himself,) ‘ You ’re a very merry fellow,’ says he ; ‘ where do you come from ? ’ ‘ From Dublin, sir,’ says O’Dempsy. ‘ Oh, I know that by the road you ’re goin,’ says the juke ; but I mane, where is your place ? ’ ‘ Faith and I have no place,’ says O’Dempsy : ‘ I wish I had.’ ‘ That ’s a touch at you,’ says the juke to the third gentleman, whoever he was. ‘ But where are you goin’ to ? ’ says the juke. ‘ I ’m goin’ home, sir,’ says O’Dempsy. ‘ And where are you when you ’re at home ? ’ says the juke. ‘ ‘ Faith, I ’m at home everywhere,’ says O’Dempsy.

“ Well, Lord Edward laughed at his brother, seein’ he couldn’t force a straight answer out of O’Dempsy. ‘ Will you tell me thin,’ says the juke, ‘ which are you—Ulsther, Leinsther, Munsther, or Connaught ? ’ ‘ Leinsther, sir,’ says O’Dempsy, though it was a lie he was tellin’; but it was on purpose to have a laugh agin the juke, for he was layin’ a thrap for him all the time. ‘ You don’t spake like a Leinsther man,' says the juke. 'Oh, the tongue is very desaitful sometimes,' says O'Dempsy.

"Lord Edward laughed at his brother agin, and said, he'd make no hand of him. 'By gor,' says Lord Edward, 'that fellow would bate Counsellor Curran!' 'Well, I'll thry him once more,' says the juke; and with that, says he to O'Dempsy, 'What's your name?' Now that was all O'Dempsy wanted, for to nick him; and so says he, 'My name is O'Shaughnessy, sir.' 'I've cotch you now,' says the juke: 'you can't be a Leinsther man, with that name.' 'Faith, I see you're too able for me, sir,' says O'Dempsy, laading him on. 'Well, Mr. O'Shaughnessy,' says the juke, 'it's somewhere out of Munsther you come.' 'No, 'faith, sir,' says O'Dempsy, 'I am a Leinsther man in airnest; but I see you couldn't be desaived about the name, and so I'll tell you the thruth, and nothin' but the thruth, about it. I am a Leinsther man, but I wint to live in Munsther, and I was obleeged to change my name, bekaze they had no respect for me there with the one I had.'

'And what was your name?' says the juke.
'My name was Fitzjarl', sir,' says O'Dempsy;
'but they thought me only an upstart down in Munsther, so I changed it into O'Shaughnessy.'
With that the juke and Lord Edward laughed out hearty, and the third gingleton says to the juke, 'I think you've got your hit now.'
Well, sir, the juke pulled a guinea out of his pocket, and put it into O'Dempsy's hand, and says to him, laughin', 'Take that, you merry rascal, and dhrink my health!' 'Long life to your grace!' says O'Dempsy, taking off his hat; 'you deserve to be an O'Shaugh- nessy!' 'More power to you, Paddy!' says Lord Edward as they put spurs to their horses; and away they powdhered down the road, laughin' like mad."

The young traveller enjoyed Rory's anecdote excessively, and scarcely knew which to admire most,—the impudent waggery of Rory's friend, or the good humour of the Duke of Leinster and Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

After much praise of the latter, and some other strange odds and ends from Rory, the travellers separated for the night.

CHAPTER IV.

JOURNEY CONTINUED.—DESULTORY COACH CONVERSATION, IN WHICH THE LIBERTY OF “THE PRESS” IS DISCUSSED, AND THE THISTLE DECLARED TO BE NOT INDIGENOUS TO IRELAND.—ARGUMENTS AND COACHES LIABLE TO BREAK DOWN.—HINTS FOR KEEPING HOUNDS. &c. &c.

ON the following morning the coach resumed its journey, and Rory and the stranger still continued fellow-travellers.

The insolent aggressor upon Rory, as well as the passenger who sat beside him, did not appear; but their places were occupied by a person to whom Rory touched his hat as he took his seat, and another who seemed to be his companion. The latter was decidedly a Scotchman; what the other might be, it was not so easy to decide—perhaps North of England.

He addressed Rory, and expressed surprise at seeing him.

"Throth, and it's jist as little I expected to see you, Mr. Scrubbs," said Rory.

"I was up here on a little business," said Scrubbs.

"That's what you're always up to, Mr. Scrubbs," answered Rory.

"And you're just as ready for fun, Rory. I suppose it was that brought you here?"

"No, indeed, sir,—it was the coach brought me here yesterday."

"Ay, ay,—there you are at your answers! — I suppose it was in Dublin, then, you would be?"

"No, indeed, I wouldn't be if I could help it."

"Well, but you were there?"

"Yes, I was."

"And what business had you in Dublin?"

"About the lease of the place below."

"Didn't I tell you I'd see about that when the agent came down."

"Why, you wor seein' about it so long that I thought it might be out o' sight at last, and so I wint myself to the head agent, and settled it at wanst."

Scrubbs did not seem well pleased at this information; and silence having ensued in consequence, Rory took from his pocket a newspaper and began to read. For some time Scrubbs cast suspicious glances at the paper, till at last, when Rory turned over its front page and discovered the title of "The Press," Scrubbs could no longer remain silent.

"I wonder you're not ashamed," said Scrubbs.

"Of what?" said Rory.

"To read that paper."

"Faith, I'd be more ashamed if I couldn't read it!" said Rory.

"Why, it's all sedition, and treason, and blasphemy."

"What's blasphemy?" said Rory.

"'Tis a word," said the young traveller, "that some people always join to treason and sedition."

Scrubbs gave a look askance at the last speaker; but seeing he was a gentleman and rather better dressed than himself, he made no observation to him, but said in continuance to Rory, — “ I always thought you were of the peaceable and well-disposed class, O'More, and I'm sorry to see you read that desperate paper.”

“ 'Faith, it's very desperate, sure enough, if it be thtrue what they say here, that bank-notes will be soon worth nothin', and won't bring a penny a pound in a snuff-shop.”

“ What's that but treason, I'd like to know,” said Scrubbs;—“ endeavouring to undermine the government ?”

“ Sairtainly,” said the Scotchman, “ it is varra bad to destroy the cawnfidence in pooblic creydit.”

“ I dar say, sir,” said Rory to the Scotchman, “ you would rather have bank-notes, than golden guineas ?”

“ I did na say that,” said the Scotchman drily ; “ but bank-notes are a suffeecient security.”

“ And they say here,” said Rory, “ that we oughtn’t to dhrink tay nor coffee, nor take snuff, nor smoke tabacky, nor dhrink whisky.”

“ And what do you think of that?” said Scrubbs.

“ ’Faith, I think thim that has no money will follow their advice,” said Rory.

“ Ay ! but look at the villainous intention — to injure the revenue, or produce a rebellion.”

“ You think, then,” said the traveller, “ that people must either smell snuff or gunpowder, whether they will or no ?”

“ I know, sir, they’ll have gunpowder enough if it goes to that. We have plenty of loyal men to put down sedition, both militia and yeomanry.”

“ Which you can’t trust,” said the traveller.

"Do you doubt their loyalty, sir?" said Scrubbs, waxing rather angry.

"It would seem the government does," said the traveller, "for whole regiments of yeomanry have been disbanded this year."

This was a bitter truth to Scrubbs, who not being able to deny the fact, returned to the charge upon "The Press."

"As for that vile paper, they would do right to serve it as 'The Northern Star' was served the other day, when the Donegal Militia, God bless them! broke open their office, burnt their papers, and broke their printing-presses."

"What noble and constitutional work for soldiers to be employed upon!" said the traveller. "I do not wonder, when the cloth is so degraded, that high-minded gentlemen, such as the Duke of Leinster, Lord O'Neil, and Colonel Conolly, resign their regiments."

This was another bitter fact to which Scrubbs was unable to reply; so, leaving the field in possession of the enemy, he addressed his Scotch friend on some fresh subject, and thus evaded the discussion.

The traveller with Rory, and Scrubbs with the Scotchman, now kept themselves distinct, and the day was passing away slowly enough, the monotony of the road only broken by some occasional remark between Scrubbs and his friend, or the young traveller and Rory : — seeming to observe each other with mutual distrust, a restraint was put upon general conversation, and it was only some passing observation on the surrounding scenery that either party would venture to indulge in.

The day was more than half spent, when they were driving through a fine tract of country, which called forth the Scotchman's admiration.

"A fine kintra, this, Mr. Scrubbs," said he.

"Yes," said Scrubbs, "'tis a good sort of country, but not fit to compare with England."

Rory looked indignantly at him, but said nothing.

"I dinna ken aboot England," said the Scotchman; "but this kintra puts me varra much in mind o' my ain."

"Your kinthry, do you say?" said Rory with what heroines call "ineffable contempt."

"Yes, my kintra."

"Oh, do you hear this!!" said Rory to the young traveller. "He's comparin' this counthry to his!! — Why, 'tare' an 'ouns! sir," said Rory to the Scotchman; "sure you wouldn't be comparin' this lovely fine counthry to Scotland — or sayin' it was like it?"

"Yes, but I would, though," said the Scotchman pertinaciously.

"Why, by the seven blessed candles, you haven't seen a thistle for the last tin miles!" said Rory.

The young traveller laughed at Rory's illustration, and the silence and disunion of the two parties increased.

Thus the day wore on uncomfortably enough, and the evening began to close, when a premature stop was put to their journey by the breaking down of the coach.

Fortunately for the passengers, the accident was not one that placed them in any danger. Some of them were nearly thrown off, and a lady-passenger who was inside screamed, of course; and the more she was assured that there was no danger, the louder she screamed. In the mean while, the passengers jumped off; and the extreme amount of damage to them was, that they could proceed no further by the coach on their journey, as one of the wheels was broken.

Now, whenever an accident of this kind occurs which is manifestly so bad as to be beyond retrieving, it may be remarked that every one looks at it in all possible ways—under it, and over it, and round it, just as if looking at it could do any good. So were the passengers congregated round the wheel of the coach, all making their remarks.

“ It was the nave,” said one.

“ No,—the spokes,” said another.

"Oh dear, no,—the tire," added a third.

"Most provoking!"

"Scandalous!" said Scrubbs; "like everything else in this country! The proprietors ought to be prosecuted for having a coach in such a condition."

"Murther, murther!" said the coachman, who lost his temper at last when the honour of his coach was concerned: "do you hear this! just as if an accident never happened to a coach before."

"When people pay their money," said Scrubbs, "they have a right to complain."

"Sairtinly," said the Scotchman. "In fac, I thenk the money should be refunded."

"Arrah! listen to him!" said Rory aside to the stranger.

"How far is the coach from the end of the journey?" said the lady.

"'Pon my word, ma'am," said Rory, "the coach is at the end of its journey for this day, anyhow."

"And what are we to do?" said the lady.

"I'd adveyse," said the Scotchman, "that we should get poost-chaises, and charge them to the coach propreytors."

"Faith, that's a fine plan, if you could get them," said Rory.

"Then what are we to do?" said the lady, again.

"If you'd be quiet the laste taste, ma'am, if you plaze," said the coachman, "we'll contrive some conthrvance by-and-by."

"Why, the night is falling," said the lady.

"It's time for it," said Rory.

"My God!" said the lady, "what odd answers these people give one!"

The horses now became restless, for the wheelers, pulling, and finding so much resistance, began to kick, and their example set the leaders going: the coachman and Rory ran to their heads.

"Bad luck to you, you fools!" said Rory to the horses; "sure, it's glad, and not sorry, you ought to be, that the dhrag is off o' you; be quite! you garrans, will you!" and he forced them at last into some obedience. "I tell you what you'll do now," said he to the coachman: "jist take off the horses,—they'll be quite enough here, grazing by the side o' the gripe;*" and you get on one o' them, and pelt away into the town, and come out agin wid a fresh coach."

"Throth, and it's the best plan, I b'lieve," said the coachman, "afther all."

"And must we stay here?" said the lady.

"Barrin' you walk, ma'am."

"And how far might it be to walk?"

"Faith, I don't rightly know," said the coachman.—

"You're a feyne driver," said the Scotchman, "not to know the distance on your ain road!"

"I know it well enough whin I'm dhrivin'," said the coachman; "but how should I know how far it is to walk?"

"Why, you stupid rascal!"—said the Scotchman, about to make an elaborate argument to show the coachman the bull he had made,—but he was interrupted by Rory.

* The ditch.

“Arrah! never mind his prate, Hoolaghan; do what I bid you,—away wid you into town!”

“Indeed, I think 'tis the best thing you can do,” said the young traveller.

“And must we stay here? Why, 'tis growing dark already, and we may be murdered while you are away.”

“Devil a one 'ill take the throuble to murther you—don't be in the laste afear'd!” said Rory. “Up wid you now on the grey, Hoolaghan, your sowl, and powdher awaylike shot!”

“What's that he's saying, sir, about powder and shot?” said the lady in alarm.

“He's only giving directions to the coachman, madam,” said the young traveller.

“But he said powder and shot! sir:—is there any danger?”

“None in the least, I assure you, madam.”

“The horses 'ill stay quite enough while you're gone,” said Rory; “here, gi' me your fut—I'll lift you on the baste." And so saying, Hoolaghan placed his left foot in Rory's right-hand ; and thus aided, he sprang astride of one of the coach-horses.

" There now," said Rory, " you're up ! and away wid you ! Jist be into the town in no time, and back in less. 'That's the cut !' says Cutty when he cut his mother's throat.'"

" What's that he's saying, sir, about cutting throats ?" said the lady.

" Nothing, madam, I assure you, you need be alarmed at," said the traveller.

" Indeed, you need not make yourself onaisy, ma'am, in the laste," said Rory after he had placed Hoolaghan on horseback. " It will be all over with you soon now."

The lady shuddered at the phrase, but spoke not.

" And now, sir," said Rory to his fellow-traveller, " it's time we should be thinkin' of ourselves : there's no use you should be loitherin' here until the other coach comes back ; for though it's some miles from the town, where, I suppose, you were goin' to, it's not far from this where I must turn off to my own place, which lies across the counthry, about two miles or there away: and if you, sir, wouldn't think it benathe you to come to a poor man's house, sure it's proud I'd be to give your honour a bed; and though it may not be as good as you're used to, still maybe 'twill be betther than stoppin' here by the road-side."

The traveller expressed his thanks to Rory for the kindness of his offer, but said that perhaps he could as well walk to the town. To this Rory objected, suggesting the probability of the traveller's losing his way, as he could only be his guide as far as the point where he had to turn towards his own home; besides many other arguments urged on Rory's part with so much heart and cordiality, that he prevailed on his fellow-traveller to accept his proffered hospitality. Selecting a small portmanteau from the luggage, the traveller was about to throw it over his shoulder, when Rory laid hold of it, and insisted on carrying it for him.

" You've your own luggage to carry !" said the traveller.

" Sure, mine is nothin' more than a small bundle—no weight in life."

" And your gridirons, Rory ?"

" By the powers ! I was near forgettin' thim," said Rory ; " but sure, thim itself is no weight, and I can carry thim all !"

" Stay a moment," said the traveller, whose gallantry forbade that he should leave the lady of the party, alarmed as she was, in such a situation, and apparently not regularly protected, without the offer of his services. He approached the coach, into which the lady had retired to avoid the dew that was now falling heavily, and made his offer with becoming courtesy.

" I'm much obliged to you, sir," said she, " but I have my husband here."

" Thank you, sir," said a miserable-looking little man, who had not uttered a word before;

"I am this lady's husband."—He did not dare to say, "This lady's my wife."

The traveller made his bow, and he and his guide, leaving the forlorn coach-passengers on the road, proceeded at a smart pace towards the cottage of Rory O'More.

"Those people, I think, are likely to remain a good while before assistance can reach them," said the traveller.

"Faith, I'm thinkin' myself they'll have a good long wait of it," said Rory; "and in throth I'm not sorry for some o' thim."

"Don't you pity that unfortunate woman?"

"Sorra much!" said Rory; "the screechin' fool, with her shoutin' about her throat bein' cut!—though, indeed, if it was cut itself, it wouldn't be much mather, for all the sinse I heard her spake. Throat cut, indeed! as if the whole counthry was murtherers and moroders. In throth the counthry would be quite (quiet) enough if they'd let us be quiet; but it's gallin' and aggravatin' us they are at every hand's turn, and puttin' the martial law on us, and callin' us bad names, and abusin' our blessed religion."

"And are the people much dissatisfied at this state of things?"

"Why, I don't see how they could be plazed, sir! And sure, my heart warmed to you whin you gave that dirty Scrubbs his answer to-day: 'faith, he got his fairin' anyhow from you! he had no chance at all with you, sir. Oh, when you silenced him, sure it was butther to my bones!"

"By the by, who is that person?" said the traveller.

"He is a fellow that lives not far from this, sir;—they call him the Collecthor."

"Collector of what?"

"Of everything, 'faith. He collects tithes for the parson, and rints for the agint, and taxes and cess, and all to that; and so he goes by the name of the Collecthor."

"He's not an Irishman?"

"No, thank God, he's not! Though, indeed, there's some of the Irish bad enough to their own, or worse than sthrangers maybe ; but I say, thank God, bekaze there 's one blackguard the less belongs to us."

" Has he been long here ?"

" Not to say very long indeed, considherin' all he has done for himself in the time. I remember, whin he came among us first, it was with some horses — a sort of low stable-helper, a kind of a hanger-on about some officers that was in the town, and thin he was badly off enough. He hadn't as much clothes on him as would scour a spit; and his flesh, the little he had of it, hangin' about him as if it didn't fit him. But he wint to church the first Sunday he was here, and, as Prodestants is scarce, he was welkim to the parson ; and so that he mightn't disgrace the congregation, the parson gev him some dacent clothes : and thin he got him to do odd jobs for him, one way or another ; and so he made himself plazin' somehow to the parson, and got on one step afther another. And the parson noticed him to the squire, and thin the squire gave him a lift, for he it was got him to be collecthor ; and now has a mighty snug house, and a nate farm nigh hand to the parson, though the first place he slep' in, not long ago, whin he came to the town beyant, was in the hayloft of the inn, for they wouldn't dirty the barrack-stables with him."

" Then the parson is his patron ?"

" Not only the parson, but the magisthrits about the place as well, for they know that Squire Ransford notices him."

" How did he get into the squire's good graces ?"

" There was a cast-off lady of the squire's, that was throublesome to him, and so he gev some soft discourse, and hard cash too, I b'lieve, to Scrubbs, to make an honest woman of her, and take her off his hands ; and so he did ; and now you 'll see her goin' in her jantin' car, if you plaze, along wid that manespirited dog that tuk another man's lavings, marchin' into church every Sunday as bowld as brass, and wid as many ribbons on her as would set up a thravellin' pedlar."

"And what does the parson say to all this? Does he countenance the affair?"

"Arrah, what can he do, sir?" said Rory. "Sure, he can't help if she was unproper; and isn't it betther she'd go to her duty than stay away, bad as she is? And sure, if she was a sinner, that's the greater the raison why he'd be glad to help her in mendin' her ways; and sure, as she hasn't the luck to be a Roman, it's well for her she's even a Prodestant!"

"That's a very charitable view of the matter on your part," said the traveller.

"Oh, by dad, sir! you mustn't be too hard on the parson, for he's a dacent man enough. If all the Prodestants was as quite (quiet) as him, we'd never fall out wid thim, for he's a nice aisy man, and is good friends wid Father Kinshela, and both o' thim dines together wid the squire whin he's here. And you know, sir, that's hearty!"

"Very indeed," said the traveller. "I'm glad to hear it."

"Scrubbs himself is a nasty fellow; and his lady is a dab, and nothin' else : but sure the parson can't help that, and I wouldn't expect of him to be too particular on him, for sure he must be glad to get a Prodestant at all in his church, where they are so scarce. Throth, it must be cowld work there, in a big ramblin' church in the winther, wid so few in it, to be sayin' prayers!"

" You seem to like the parson, I think?" said the traveller.

" Oh, I don't mislike him, sir, for he's civil-spoken, and a hearty man, and he likes huntin' and shootin', and divarshin of all sorts."

" But do you think that becoming in a clergymen?"

" Oh, you're too hard on the clargy, sir ;—why wouldn't they be merry?—sure Father Kinshela himself sometimes takes a dart afther the dogs, whin the squire is down here, as well as the parson."

" Squire Ransford, then, lives here a good deal?"

" Not a good dale, sir,—only by times whin he comes down to take a start huntin' or shootin', and thin he brings down a power o' company wid him: but unless at that time, the place is like a wildherness, only an ould woman and a couple o' maids to mind the house, and a stable-helper left, or somethin' that way, to watch the place."

"A single stable-helper! Didn't you tell me he keeps a pack of hounds?"

"Yis, sir; but he doesn't keep up the dogs unless whin he's here himself."

"How does he manage, then?"

"Why, he gives one couple o' dogs to one tenant, and another couple to another, and so on in that way, while he isn't in the place; and whin he comes back, he gathers thim in again; and so he isn't at the expense of keepin' up the kennel while he's away."

"What a shabby fellow!" said the traveller.

"Oh! not to say shabby, sir."

"Why, what else can you call quartering his dogs on his poor tenantry?"

"Oh, for all that he's not shabby;—for whin he is down here, the company is never out of his house; and they say there's lashings and lavings of everything in it, and the claret flyin' about the place as common as beer, and no stint to any one, I 'm towld."

" That 's mere wastefulness and rioting, and cannot in my opinion redeem his shabbiness, for I cannot call it anything else. Can he not feel that when the poor people feed his sporting-dogs, the fruit of their labour is invaded to contribute to his pleasure?"

" Why, if you go to the rights o' the thing, what your honour says is thruen enough; but we wouldn't be too sharp in lookin' at what a gintleman would do,—and, indeed, I don't mislike it myself, as far as that goes, for the couple o' dogs that is left with me I do have a great deal of fun with."

" How ? "

" Huntin' rabbits, sir."

" They must be nice dogs after that !"

" Divil a harm it does them!—sure it comes nath'ral to the craythurs, and would be cruel to stint them of their divarshin."

" And do you all hunt rabbits with the dogs left to your care ?"

" Every one of us."

" Then the pack can't be worth a farthing."

" Why, indeed, I don't deny they run a little wild now and thin ; but sure what would be the use of a whipper-in if the dogs worn't a little fractious ?"

Rory continued his discourse with the stranger as they proceeded on their road, giving him various information respecting the squire, and the collector, and the parson, in all of which, though Rory did not so intend it, his hearer found deep cause of disapproval of their conduct. Their conversation was now interrupted by the deep baying of dogs ; and Rory answered the sound by a cheering whoop, and the calling of the dogs by their names.

" There they are, sir !" said he ; " you see we're jist at home."

As he spoke, they turned into the little boreen already noticed, and two hounds came rushing wildly up the lane and jumped upon Rory with all the testimonials of canine recognition.

"Down, Rattler, you devil, down!—you'll tear the coat av my back. Murther! Sweetlips, don't be kissin' me—down, you brutes!" And he drove the animals from him, whose furious caresses were more than agreeable. "Poor things!" said he to the stranger in a kindly tone; "sure, thin, it's pleasant even to have a dog to welkim one home."

"More than a dog, Rory dear," said a sweet voice from amid the darkness; and the next instant a girl ran up to Rory, and throwing her arms round his neck, kissed him over and over again. He returned her embrace with affection, and said, "How is the mother?"

"Hearty, thank God," said the girl.

"And yourself, Mary dear?"

"Oh, what would ail me?—But tell me, what sort of a place is Dublin?—and how did you like it?—and did you get me the ribbon?"

"It's my sisther, sir," said Rory to his guest, paying no attention to the numerous questions of Mary, who now for the first time observing the stranger, dropped a short curtsy to him, and said in a subdued voice, "Your sarvant, sir."

"Run on, Mary dear, and tell the mother we're comin'," said Rory, accompanying his words with a significant pinch on Mary's elbow, which meant, "Make the place look as dacent as possible."

Mary ran hastily forward, fully understanding Rory's telegraphic communication; and when the travellers reached the cottage, they found the mother and Mary in that peculiar state of action which in the polite world is called "hurry-scurry;" and the dragging of chairs and stools, cramming of things into corners, and slapping about with the ends of aprons, testified their anxiety to receive so unusual a visitor with proper honour.

When they entered, the widow first received her son with the strongest evidence of a mother's affection, kissing him tenderly ; and with the reverential appeal to Heaven in which the Irish peasantry so much indulge, she said, ' God bless you, alanna, you 're welkim home ! ' She then turned to the stranger, and in that soft accent of her country which so well expresses the gentlest emotions of human nature, she said, in tones that would have almost conveyed her meaning without words, ' You 're kindly welkim, sir.'

The stranger expressed his thanks ; but, notwithstanding the manifest commotion which his arrival occasioned, he was too polite to seem to notice it, and did not, as a vulgar person always does, overload the people with requests not to trouble themselves on his account.

He quietly took a seat ; and Rory, with instinctive good-breeding, took another, and continued to discourse with his guest. Now and then, to be sure, he could not help casting his eyes towards his mother, who was busy in all sorts of preparation, and asking, " Can I help you, mother dear ? " But the answer always was,

"No, alanna. Sure you're tired afther your journey; and Mary and myself will do every-thing; and sure it's glad we are to have you, and proud that the gintleman is come with you, and only hopes he'll put up with what we can do: but sure, if the enthertainment is poor, the welkim is hearty, anyhow."

The stranger assured her of his sense of her kindness.

"If we knew of your comin', sir, sure we could have had a couple of chickens ready; and if the gintleman would wait a bit, sure it isn't too late yet, and can have a rashir and egg in the mane time."

"My dear ma'am," said the stranger, "pray don't think of chickens to-night: the fact is, I'm very hungry, and I don't know a better thing than a dish of rashers and eggs, which has the great advantage, besides, of being got ready sooner."

Rashers and eggs were accordingly got ready immediately; and while the mother was engaged in the culinary department, Mary spread a coarse but white cloth upon the table, and taking down from a cleanly-scowered dresser some plates of coarse delf, arranged the table for the supper. This the hungry travellers discussed with good appetite and much relish ; and after many relays of the savoury viands had vanished rapidly before them, a black bottle of whiskey was produced, and some hot punch being made, Rory's guest protested he had eaten one of the best suppers he ever made in his life.

Rory and his mother and sister were lavish in their compliments to the stranger on being so easily pleased, and uttered a profusion of wishes that they had better to offer. This by their guest was pronounced impossible ; and when at last the stranger retired to bed, they parted for the night with the highest opinion of each other,—he in admiration of their hospitality, and they of his condescension.

Rory then, with his mother and sister drew round the fire, and, relieved from the presence of a stranger, indulged in that affectionate family gossip which always is the result when one of the circle has returned from a temporary absence. Rory sat on a chair in the middle, his sister on a low stool beside him, with one hand resting on his knee, and her pretty eyes raised to his, in open wonder, only to be exceeded by the more open wonder of her mouth, as Rory told something of what he had seen in Dublin. The widow, on the other side, seated in a low easy chair of platted straw, looked upon her son with manifest pleasure; and while she led Rory into a digression, by asking him how he managed "the little business" about the lease, Mary filled up the interval very agreeably by looking with ecstasy at the roll of ribbon which her brother brought her. This was a great delight to Mary:—it was no pedlar's trash,—no common thing bought at a booth in a fair,—but a real down-right metropolitan ribbon, "brought all the way from Dublin to herself." Wasn't she happy? And maybe she didn't think how she'd astonish them next Sunday at chapel!

Rory told them how he met the stranger he brought home, and of the accident which led to it, and praised him to the skies for his liberality and gentlemanly conduct—swore he was of the right sort, and said, he was one for whom a poor man ought to lay down his life. Such was Rory's opinion of the stranger he had met, and who was introduced to the reader in the first chapter under the title of the "Scholar." How he acquired this title, will be subsequently seen.

The trio talked on until the embers on the hearth were quite burnt out, and it was at an advanced hour in the morning that they separated and retired to their slumbers, which were sound, because their lives were healthful and innocent.

CHAPTER V.

WHISKEY VERSUS SMALL-POX. — GHIBBERISH VERSUS FRENCH.—A SECRET WITH TWO HANDLES TO IT, WHICH OUR HERO AND HIS SISTER LAY HOLD OF.

THE next morning the Widow O'More and her son and daughter arose refreshed and light-hearted, but not so their guest: he awoke with the burning thirst, intense headach, and deadening sensation of sickness, which are the precursors of fever. It was early, and from the silence that reigned in the cottage he concluded no one had yet risen. He endeavoured to sleep, but the effort was vain: he fell but into a confused dozing, filled with broken images, confused recollections, and wild imaginings, from which he started but with an increased sensation of illness upon him; and even when the inhabitants of the cottage rose, they came not near him, wishing to leave him undisturbed after his fatigue. At length, on his hearing Rory's voice, he exerted his so as to make himself heard ; and when Rory entered, he perceived, from the heavy eye and altered countenance of the stranger, that he was unwell.

" God be good to us ! what's the matther with you, sir ?" said Rory.

" I 'm ill, very ill, O'More," said the stranger languidly.

" Well, don't disturb yourself, sir, and you 'll be betther by and by, plaze God !"

" I 'm afraid I 've caught the small-pox," said the stranger.

" I hope not, sir : don't be thinkin' o' sich things. Sure, how would you get the small-pox ?"

" From a beggar in the crowd ere last night, when we alighted at the inn. I remember shuddering at the mention of the disease when she spoke of it ; and I fear I am infected with what I dread more than anything under the sun.” *

“ I had betther bring my mother to you, sir,” said Rory, “ for she is very knowledgeable in sickness, and undherstands the aribs” (herbs); and with these words he left the room, leaving the poor sick stranger utterly at a loss to know what her knowledge of the Arabs, as he took Rory’s word to be, could have to do with his illness.

When Rory returned with his mother, she asked the stranger (for so we shall yet continue to call him) how he felt. He told in what manner he was suffering, and she replied by proposing to him to take a glass of whiskey. The very name of the thing produced nausea to the sick man, who refused the offer with a shudder.

“ See how you thrimble, sir !” said she.

* He must have caught the disease earlier, as the infection of small-pox does not exhibit itself so soon. But young gentlemen are not expected to be too learned in such matters.

"Indeed, if you b'lieve me, a good big dhrop o' whiskey is the best thing you could take."

"Don't mention it, I beg of you. I fear it is the small-pox I have caught."

"Plaze God, I hope not!" said the widow : "but if it is, not a finer thing in the world than a dhrop o' whiskey to dhrive it out from your heart."

Thus she continued to urge the taking of ardent spirits, which, to this hour, in the commencement of every sickness amongst the Irish peasantry, is considered the one thing needful, and for the reason the widow assigned in this case, namely, to "dhrive it out from the heart." The heart is by them considered the vulnerable point in sickness as well as in love ; so much so indeed, that no matter what disease they labour under, it is always called an "impression on the heart." So well understood does this seem to be amongst them, that even the part affected is not necessary to be named, and the word 'heart' is omitted altogether ; and if you ask "What's the matter with such-a-one?" the answer is sure to be, "He's got an impression."

"Mrs. O'More," said the stranger, "I am certain it is the small-pox; and while I may yet be moved, pray let me be conveyed to the neighbouring town, to the inn, and let not your house be visited with the disease and the contagion."

"Oh, God forbid that I'd do the like, sir, and turn the sick shtanger outside my doors whin it's most he wanted the caring for—and in an inn too! Oh, what would become of you at all in sich a place, where I wouldn't have a sick dog, much less a gntleman, behowldin' to! Make yourself aisy, sir; and if it's as bad as you think, we'll take care o' you, niver fear."

"I don't fear," said the stranger, affected by the widow's kindness; "but it is not right that you should have this horrid disease under your roof, and all for a stranger."

"Keep your mind aisy, dear, do," said the widow: — "sure we're all poor craythers, God help us ! — and if we did not help one another in our want and throuble, it's the dark and blake world it would be !— and what would we be Chrishthans for at all, if we hadn't charity in our hearts ? I beg your pardon, sir, for sayin' charity to a gentleman — but sure it's not charity I mane at all, only tindherness and compassion. And as for the sickness being undher our roof, my childher, God be praised ! is over the small-pox—iv it be it—and had it light,— as well as myself : so make your mind aisy, dear, and dhrive it out from your heart with the whiskey. Well, well ! don't shake your poor head that way ; I won't ax you to take it till you like it yourself: but whin there is an impression, there 's nothin' like dhrivin' it out. So I 'll lave you, sir, for a while — and see if you can sleep ; and I 'll come in again by and by ; and if you want anything in the mane time, you can jist thump on the flure with the chair—I have put it convaynient to your hand : — and the sooner you can bring yourself to take the sper'ts, the betther. Well, well ! I 'll say no more — only it's the finest thing in the world; with a clove o' garlic, for worms or fayver, to throw out the venom." And so, muttering praises on her favourite panacea, she left the room.

The illness of the stranger increased during the day, and in the evening he began to speak incoherently. The Widow O'More now thought it probably was the small-pox with which her guest was visited, and began to take the most approved measures that were in those days established for the cure of that terrible disease ; — that is to say, she stopped every crevice of the room whereby air could be admitted, opened the door as seldom as possible, and heaped all the clothes she could on the patient, and gave him hot drinks to allay the raging thirst that consumed him. Not content with heaping bed-clothes over the unhappy sufferer, she got a red cloth cloak and wrapped it tightly round his body ; it being in those days considered that a wrapper of red cloth was of great virtue.

Let the reader, then, imagine the wretched plight the poor stranger was reduced to, and what chance of recovery he had from such treatment. The fever increased fearfully, and he soon became quite delirious. During his ravings he imagined the bed in which he lay to be a tent; for, with national hospitality, he had been placed in the best bed in the house, with the flaring calico curtains before mentioned.

"Why is this tent square?" said he.

"Whisht, whisht, dear," said the widow soothingly.

"But why is it square?—And look here," said he, seizing the curtain,—"why is not this white? why is my tent red?—or is it the blood of the enemy upon it?"

"God help the crayther!" said the widow.

Rory now entered the room; and the stranger started up in the bed and said, "Qui vive?"

"Sir?" said Rory, rather astonished.

"Ah! c'est mon caporal," pursued the sick man. "Caporal, nous avons vaincu les Anglais!" —voilà leur sang;” and he shook the curtains fiercely.

“Humour him, dear,” said the widow to Rory; “the crayther’s ravin’: purtend you know all about it—that’s the best way to soother him.”

“Sure I dunna what he’s sayin’—he’s muttherin’ ghibberish there.”

“Well, do you mutther ghibberish too,” said the widow, and left the room.

“Répondez vite, caporal,” said the invalid.

“Hullabaloo!” shouted Rory.

“Qu'est-ce que c'est?”

“Hullabaloo!” cried Rory again.

“Vous êtes étranger,” said the poor sufferer; “tremblez! esclave, tremblez! rendez-vous!” and he jumped up in bed—“rendez au drapeau tricolor!”

“A dhrop o’ what?” said Rory.

“Vive le drapeau tricolor!” cried de Lacy.

Rory left the room, and told his mother he believed “the poor gintleman was callin’ for a dhrop o’ something.” She entered with more hot drink, and asked the sick man to swallow ; “ It ’ill do you good, dear,” said she.

“ Is there anything you’d like betther, sir ? ” said Rory ; “ and if it ’s to be had I ’ll get it for you.”

The stranger seemed to be recalled from his raving a moment by the sounds of another language upon his ears ; and looking wildly again at Rory and his mother, and the bed, he said, “ This is not my tent—who are you ?—where am I ? ”—and he flung the bed-clothes down from him ;—then seeing the red cloak wrapped round him, he said fiercely, “ Take this accursed cloth from off me,—I ’m no slave of the English tyrants ;—where ’s my blue uniform ? ”

“ Lie down, dear, lie down,” said the widow.

“ Never ! ” said the sick man,—“ we’ll never lie down under tyranny ! ” and he attempted to jump from the bed.

“ Rory, dear, howld him,” said the widow,—“ howld him, or he ’ll be out ; and if he catches cowld, he ’s lost.”

Rory now by force held down the sufferer, who struggled violently for a while, but, becoming exhausted, sank back on the bed and groaned aloud, “ Ah ! I see what my fate is,— I’m a prisoner in the hands of the accursed English ! ”

For some time he now lay quieter, and Mary was left to watch in his chamber while Rory was absent for some drugs his mother sent him for to the neighbouring village. During her sojourn in the room, Mary often heard the stranger lamenting his fate in a plaintive tone, and calling on a female name in passionate accents. In this state for some days the patient continued ; his paroxysms of raving being but varieties of lamenting his fate as a prisoner, calling for his blue uniform, and invoking a female name. From the nature of all this raving Rory and Mary drew each their own conclusions. Rory, from his knowledge of the stranger’s bearing and opinions before he fell sick, and from the tone of his subsequent delirium, suspected he was an officer in the French army ; and Mary, from his frequent calling on a female name, had no doubt he was in love. Now, to the end of time, Mary could never have guessed at the stranger's profession, nor Rory at the state of his heart : but these are the delicate shades of difference that exist between the mind of man and woman. The sympathies of the former are alive to turmoil and strife ; those of the latter, to the gentle workings of our nature : the finer feelings of a woman vibrate with magic quickness to the smallest indications of affection ; while man, like the war-horse of the Psalmist, “ smelleth the battle afar off.”

Both Rory and Mary were right in their conclusions : the sick stranger was an officer in the French service, and also was in love.

With respect to the love affair, the tangled business may go tangling on, as the more tangled such affairs become the better ; but of the stranger's name and purposes it is time the reader should be informed.

CHAPTER VI.

IN WHICH A GENTLEMAN WRITES A LETTER AS LONG AS A LADY'S.

HORACE DE LACY was the stranger's name. Descended from the noble race of De Lacy, one of the original conquerors of Ireland, he inherited all the fire and courage of his ancestors; but now, the descendant of the enslaver became the champion of liberty, and panted with as burning a zeal for the regeneration of his country as his ancestors had done for her subjugation, for Ireland was now his native land, and the remark so often made in the chronicles of England, that the descendants of English settlers in Ireland became more fierce in their rebellion than the natives themselves, was about to be once more verified in the person of Horace De Lacy.

Though an Irishman by birth, he had for some years been resident in France. There he imbibed all the fierce enthusiasm to which the epoch of the French revolution gave birth, and the aspirations for universal liberty which fired his young heart were first directed to his native land. As early as 1794, communications were carried forward between the disaffected in Ireland and the French executive; and Doctor Jackson, one of the agents at that period, was discovered, and would have been hanged, but that he escaped the ignominious death by swallowing poison in the dock, where he died in the face of his accusers and his judges. The death of Jackson produced a great sensation in Ireland. It made the rapacious and intolerant faction that then ruled the country, more insolent; and those who cursed their rule and endeavoured to overthrow it, more cautious.

The result was fearful. Wrong was heaped upon wrong by the oppressor; — suffered in hopelessness, but remembered, by the oppressed. Each new aggression on the one side produced a debt of hatred on the other, and the account was carried on with compound interest.

In 1797, another communication was opened between the disaffected in Ireland and the executive of the French government, and De Lacy was one of the agents. He was an officer in the French army, and volunteered to undertake the dangerous duty of visiting Ireland and England, with a view of ascertaining the probable likelihood of success in a revolutionary movement in the one country, and the state of feeling as regarded a desire of revolution in the other.

In France, at that period, it is singular the total ignorance that existed with relation to the state of the united dominions of Great Britain. Repeatedly as they had been assured of the certainty of co-operation in a descent upon Ireland, and the futility of any such attempt upon England, nevertheless the absurd scheme was entertained of letting loose some French desperadoes in England, and carrying on a system of Chouannerie in that country.

The most active and intelligent of the Irish emissaries, Theobald Wolfe Tone, then resident at Paris, had repeatedly assured the French executive that such a plan was worse than hopeless, but still they were not convinced ; and General Clarke, then minister of war, because he bore an Irish name, and was of Irish descent, thinking he must know something of the matter, though he never had set foot in the country, helped to strengthen them in this belief, and notwithstanding all the assurances and arguments of Tone, Clarke would not be satisfied of the truth of such statements without having an emissary of his own to visit the country and report upon it.

De Lacy was the person who volunteered this service ; and, crossing the Channel in the boat of a smuggler, who knew the coast well, and was in constant habit of communication with both England and Ireland,—but particularly the latter,—he had been for some time in London and through the English provinces before he visited Ireland. There he had but recently arrived when Rory O'More met him as a travelling companion ; and of the events of his journey since, the reader is in possession.

What impressions his observations in England produced may be seen by the following letter, which was forwarded to France by a sailor on board a vessel which traded between Dublin and France, under Swedish colours, and under the particular patronage of Lord —, then high in the government of Ireland, and the most vindictive enemy of the liberal party.

It may be asked, why did Lord — permit, much less patronise, this proceeding ? It was because the vessel was chartered by a certain merchant to whom he was indebted in large loans of money ; and the accommodation thus afforded was partly paid by the exclusive permission of trading with France thus granted by Lord —, whose influence in Ireland was then so paramount, that a word from him was sufficient to guarantee the safety of his friend's ship, by the willing blindness of the commissioners of customs, who always treated this make-believe Swedish vessel with the most exemplary indulgence. Certain intelligence from France, too, was procured in this way : but while the noble lord and his party thus obtained information, they little dreamed that the same channel was used for the transmission of intelligence between their enemies.

In the packet of information that follows, the reader must not be startled at its high-sounding style : the tone of the period was extravagant, particularly in France ; and De Lacy was at that age and of that profession which delights in flourishes, whether of trumpets or words. The packet was addressed to a certain “ Citizen Madgett ” at Paris, well known in those days to the Irish republican party, and to whom General Clarke had desired De Lacy’s communications to be made. Its contents ran thus :

“ You know with what feelings I left France. I rejoiced there, in common with my fellows, in the triumph that right had achieved over wrong; in the majesty of human nature overcoming the kings that would have enslaved her; in the brilliant era of retribution and resuscitation that more than redeemed the tyranny and suffering that gave it birth. You know how I hoped, in the warmth of my head and heart, that the rest of mankind should share in the blessings we had so dearly purchased with our blood, and that man, freed from the thraldom of ages, should form but one family; that the prejudices and distinctions of countries should be forgotten, and regenerated mankind, as one nation, kneel Peruvian-like, to the newly-risen sun of their freedom.

“ But this glorious dream has been disturbed since I left you. I visited England with the view of kindling on a thousand altars the fire of liberty that I bore with me from liberty’s own temple: but the moral as well as the natural atmosphere of England is damp and chilly compared with the country of the vine, and I found myself a disappointed enthusiast, with few or none to share in my raptures. My hymn of liberty was not half so cheering to me as the clank of John Bull's chains to his own ears ; (and long enough they are;) and a priest of liberty, like any other priest, cuts a very contemptible figure without a congregation.

"So, after some little time, seeing the state of affairs stand thus, I began to look about me with more observation. 'Perhaps,' said I to myself, 'John Bull is like his own flint-stones, with fire enough in him, only you must strike him hard ;' and so I laid myself out for observation, and was on the alert for every grievance.

"I was baffled in making any great advances towards my object, and after some time fruitlessly spent, it struck me that the capital city of a kingdom is not the place to judge of the real state of a country, or measure the feelings of the people. 'Here,' said I, 'in London, where peers have their palaces, and merchants their mansions ; where wasteful wealth and lavish luxury deprave the whole community, and blinding the citizen to the real state of things, make him believe, because he is a sharer in the plunder they are wasting, that he is a gainer by their extravagance ; —here is not the place to hope for the altar of freedom and the rights of regenerated man to be respected. The Londoner will endure the abuses of his time because he enjoys from them a temporary benefit, and even upholds the very tyranny of which he himself will be the last to suffer. But to be the last in suffering is considered a wondrous gain in our contemptible natures. How like men are to children in such matters ! I remember, at school, how the timid boys hung back from a cup of medicine, or the cold-bath, or punishment, and the wretch who was last drenched with rhubarb, shoved into the river, or flogged, thought himself a clever fellow, and enjoyed a sort of per centage on the suffering that had gone before him. So is it,' thought I, 'with the Londoner : but I will go into the country, and there, in the interior of England, observe the canker that is at her heart ; and while I observe the disease, I will inculcate the remedy.'

"With this view, I quitted the capital and visited a village. The lord of the soil (one of the magnificent English baronets) I knew was in the capital at the time, and from his neglected and forsaken tenantry I might hope to hear the murmurs of dissatisfaction and the desire of redress. But in this I was disappointed. I wished to see what extent of domain the aristocrat appropriated to his own enjoyment (when he was at home), and walked towards 'the Honor,' as it is called, in expectation of seeing the shutters closed, and grass growing through the avenues. I leaped a fence, and proceeded through a rich field and a piece of beautiful plantation, until I was accosted by a well-dressed peasant, who asked me, somewhat sturdily, what brought me there. I told him I was going to look over the grounds and see the house. He asked me, had I got leave, and how did I get in? On telling him how, he said that crossing the fence was not permitted, and suggested my going back. I said, if the family were at home, I would not have taken the liberty to intrude; but in their absence there could be no offence. 'Sir Richard is quite as particular when he is away,' was the answer. 'Is he so very churlish,' said I, 'as to object to a gentleman crossing his domain when he is away, and when his privacy cannot be invaded?' 'Oh, whether he's here or not, is no odds,' replied the man; 'for strangers running in and out of the park would spoil it just as much, whether Sir Richard be here or no.' 'Then he keeps up his park at all times?' said I. 'To be sure, sir, he do,' said the man, looking at me as if he did not know whether I was a rogue or a simpleton. 'And may I not be permitted to walk through the park?' 'Why, sir, if you get leave of Mr. Lowndes, or Mr. Banks, or the steward, or the agent, or—' And on he went, telling me how many people could give me leave, till I interrupted him by saying, ‘Why, you have a large establishment here.’ ‘Oh yes, sir,’ said he; ‘it’s all the same, like, whether Sir Richard be here or no—except that there’s not the company at the house.’ ‘And who may you be?’ I inquired. ‘One of the keepers, sir.’ ‘Well,’ said I, ‘as I have not time to ask any of the people you have named, perhaps you would be so obliging,—and all the time I kept a telegraphic fumbling of my right hand in my waistcoat pocket,—you would be so obliging as to show me up to the house,’ and as I finished my query, I slid a half-crown backwards and forwards between my fore-finger and thumb. ‘Why, sir,’ said the keeper, ‘as I sees you’re a gen’lman,—and he looked, not at me, but at the half-crown,—‘I cawn’t see no objections;’ and a transfer of my money and his civility at once was effected.

“ My guide led me through a splendid park towards the house: no grass growing through the walks, as I anticipated,—but beautifully kept, as if the lord of the soil were present. We reached the house : no closed shutters,—but half-open windows, and the curtains from within, caught by the breeze, peeping out to visit the roses that were peeping in to meet them—a sort of flirtation between the elegancies of the interior and exterior.

“ On entering the house, I found myself in a square hall, lined throughout with oak. The ceiling was low and divided by richly-carved octagonal frame-work into compartments ; the polished floor was also inlaid after the same pattern, and the wainscot elaborately panelled and covered with curious carving. Old suits of armour, cross-bows, bills, partisans, two-handed swords, and other weapons, were distributed around the apartment ; and an enormous blood-hound lay stretched upon the floor, basking in the sun, and seemed a suitable tenant of this domestic armoury. I strolled through room after room, and an air of habitual wealth prevailed throughout.

“ There was an old library, with pieces of buhl furniture, and old ebony seats and chairs, with large down cushions, where one might luxuriate in learning. And this delightful old room looked out on an antique-looking garden, whose closely-cut grass-plots were like velvet, and divided by high hedge-rows of yew, cropt as smooth as a wall. Then a large cedar spread his dusky branches so close to the windows as to exclude some portion of the light, and produce that demi-jour so suitable to a place of study. There were pictures throughout the house, principally portraits, of which the English are so fond—some of them very good, sufficiently so to be valuable as works of art. Holbein and Vandyke had immortalised some of the former owners of the Honor; and there they hung in goodly succession, holding a place on the walls of the château they had successively been masters of. The seal of Time was on all this evidence; — here from sire to son had plenty been transmitted, and wealth and comfort were hereditary. There was, withal, such an air of peace and tranquillity about the old place, that it was quite soothing : you could hear through the open casements the rustling of the flowers in the garden, as the warm breeze whispered through them and wafted their fragrance into the library. Could one at such a moment think hopefully of revolution ?—where so much comfort existed, there also would exist the love of repose. I confess I was overcome by the influence of all I had seen, and convinced that Tone is quite right. On quitting the Honor, however, I considered that though the aristocracy might revel in such enjoyments as these, the great mass of the people would be willing to invade a repose that was purchased at the price of their labour and taxation, and a system where the many were sacrificed to the few. ‘It is not in Allenby Honor I must look,’ thought I, ‘but in the village.’

“Here, after days of observation, I confess I think the hope of revolutionising England quite absurd. The comforts of the people are generally such, that men with less caution than the English would not risk the loss of them in the hope of speculative blessings. Their houses are well built, and so beautifully clean!—but not merely clean—a love of embellishment is to be seen: trailing plants perhaps festoon their windows round a bit of trellis, a white curtain peeping from within; there is a neat paling round the house, and flowers within this fence; —the cultivation of flowers in the little gardens of the lower order bespeaks a country in contentment. Then the better class of dwelling, with its paved walk leading up from the outer gate through evergreens, and its bright brass knocker and bell-pull, and white steps, that seem as if they had been washed the minute before; the windows so clean, with their Venetian blinds inside and fresh paint without;—in short, I could not enumerate a twentieth part of these trifling evidences that go to prove the ease and prosperity of these people.

“ Their domestic arrangements keep pace with this outward show. They are universally well found in the essential comforts of life;—

they have good beds, are well clothed and well fed. I saw an old fellow yesterday evening driving his water-cart to the river, and he was as fat and rosy as an alderman : the cart and the water-barrel upon it were nicely painted, and as the little donkey drew it along, the old fellow trudged beside it, comforting himself with the support of a stick. Fancy a peasant with a walking-stick !—do you think that fellow would turn rebel ?—never !

“ On a little green beside the village, some boys were playing at cricket : they had their bats and ball—poverty cannot be here when peasants can buy the materials of play for their children. Then the children seemed so careful !—the coats and hats they had taken off during their exercise were piled in a heap at a distance, and when their game was finished, they dressed themselves with such regularity !—and with what good clothes they were provided !

“ This is not the country for revolution !—such is my firm conviction. There are some in England who hail with rapture the dawn of liberty, and wish that its splendour may lighten all nations ; but that number is comparatively small, and I cannot wonder at it, after all I have seen. Believe me, there are few men in England like Horne Tooke.—By the by, I must tell you a capital thing he said the other day. The conversation ran upon definitions, and some one said it would be very hard to define what was treason. ‘Not at all,’ said Horne Tooke: ‘it is nothing but reason with a t to it.’—Wasn’t it capital ?

“ To conclude,—Tone is right. I repeat it, no hopes can be entertained of revolutionising England.

“ I go to Ireland next week ; and from all I can learn here, matters promise better for us there. I carry this letter with me to Dublin, whence I shall transmit it to you by our Swedish friend. You shall hear from me again, immediately that I have made my observations.

“ H. D. L.”

Now, bating the flourishes about freedom and regenerated mankind, there is much good sense and shrewd observation in this letter. It will be perceived, that however great his revolutionary enthusiasm, it did not carry him away into the folly of believing in impossibilities : he saw, and said, that England could not be revolutionised, for her people enjoyed too many comforts to throw them away in a civil war. This temperate tone is noticed to the reader, to show that De Lacy was a trusty agent in the cause he undertook ; that, uninfluenced by his pre-conceived notions, and in the very teeth of his wishes, he saw England was beyond the reach of revolutionary influence, and pointed out the reasons why. Let the reader mark the calm and judicious observation of the man, for in due time another letter of his will appear, describing the state of Ireland ; and the influence of that letter will be the greater by remembering the foregoing one, and bearing in mind that the same man, exercising the same observation, and with the same desire to ascertain the real probability of success in a revolutionary movement, is the writer. The wishes and hopes of the republican were utterly overthrown by the security and prosperity of England, but he found in the misery and misrule of Ireland the ready materials for a country's convulsion.

CHAPTER VII.

A MAN OF LAW AND PHYSIC.

“ He was a man to all the country dear! ”

DE LACY’s fever continued to rage and, his raving to proceed in their usual course. Two things were in his favour : his fury at the red cloth obliged the Widow O’More to give up that hope of recovering her patient ; and all her ingenuity could not induce him to take whiskey, even in the most diluted form. Sometimes, when the poor sufferer had been calling for drink for some time, the cunning prescriber would enter with a vessel of liquid containing a portion of the favourite medicine, and hoping that the anxiety for any alleviation of thirst would make him swallow it without examination.

tion, she would say — “ Now, dear, here 'tis for you. Dhrink it up at once,—dhrink it up big ! ”

Poor De Lacy would seize the vessel with avidity, and make a rush with open mouth upon it ; but the moment the presence of whiskey was apparent, he would refuse it. In mere charity, at last, though without any hope of doing him good, the widow made him some plain two-milk whey, and this he swallowed with that fierce desire for drink that the thirst of fever or the Desert only knows.

Rory procured the drugs his mother ordered at the village, and brought them back to her with all the speed that might be. What they were it is needless to know, and perhaps the Faculty might or might not be benefited by the knowledge ; but as vaccination has triumphed over the terrible plague that then scourged mankind, it is unnecessary to seek what were the nostrums the widow employed in her medical capacity.

“ Who do you think did I meet at M'Garry's to-day, whin I wint there for the physic?" said Rory on his return.

"Arrah, who thin?" said his mother.

"Sweeny!"

"Is it Sweeny?"

"Devil a less!"

"I wondher he isn't ashamed to go to the place, the dirty scut! His father was a 'pottekerry, and he must turn atturney; and instead of follyin' his dacent father's business before him, and attindin' to the 'pottekerryin', it's the 'turneyin' he must be afther — bad luck to him! — and instead of doin' people good, and curin' them of anything might come over thim, he's doin' thim all the harm he can, and laving them without anything over them, — not as much as a blanket, much less a house. His father used to cure 'ructions,* but he's risin' them; and, as I said before, I wondher he's not ashamed to go into the owld shop, for it ought to remind him that he might be a dacent 'pottekerry, instead of a skrewging 'turney, as he is : and more betoken, the dirty little 'turney to set up to be a gintleman, and for that same to change his blessed and holy religion, and turn prod'stant ! Oh, the little vagabone !"

* Ruction signifies, a breaking out, a disturbance.

Now it will be seen the widow wound up her philippic against Sweeny by placing the heaviest offence the last ;—" He turned prod'stant ;" — this was the great crime in the widow's eyes, and indeed in those of most of the people of her class. Sweeny might have robbed all Ireland, and suffered less in their opinion than by the fact of his going to church. Poor Ireland ! — the great question of a man's vice or virtue, fitness or unfitness, talent or stupidity, wisdom or folly, treason or loyalty, was answered in those days by the fact of whether he went to a protestant church or a catholic chapel. The two sects disliked each other equally ; but the protestant born and bred was not half so much loathed as the apostate who renounced the faith of his fathers for " the flesh-pots of Egypt ;" and the Roman catholics were the more jealous of this defection, because they never had any converts from the protestants in return, and for the best reason in the world,— there was nothing to be made by it.

Now it was by a process of consecutive reasoning that Sweeny had renounced physic and popery, and assumed the attorney and ascendancy. He gave up the healing art because he saw his father could make nothing of it. How could he? When a population is so poor as not to be able to afford the necessaries of life, they cannot be expected to command the remedies against death: if they cannot buy bread, they will hardly buy physic. So Sweeny the younger turned his attention towards the law, which is an amusement that those who have something to lose deal in, and therefore belongs more to the richer classes,— or, as they call themselves, the better classes.

Now as these better (alias richer) classes in Ireland were on the side of the protestants, Sweeny thought that conforming to the church as by law established would be a move in his favour, and accordingly he (to use the words of a paragraph in one of the government papers of the day) “ renounced the errors of the church of Rome, and embraced those of the church of England.”

He had lived long enough with his father to pick up a few words of apothecary Latin, and these he mixed with a vile jargon of his own, which he imposed on people for medical knowledge ; and although as ignorant as a horse in every way, he had the impudence to enact the amateur doctor, and gave advice gratis in physic to his clients in law. This dabbling in doctoring permitted him to indulge in a ruling propensity of his nature, which was, curiosity : while he played the doctor, he could play the inquisitor ; and by his joint possession of cunning and impudence, it is surprising how he used to ferret out intelligence. He seldom ventured on giving prescriptions of his own, and to avoid this, he always recommended some patent medicine, a supply of which he kept by him to furnish to his friends, and he charged them a handsome profit on the same. He would say —

“ My dear ma'am, don't be going to that dreadful M'Garry ! You 'll ruin your health — your precious health ! you can't depend upon his drugs at all : he hasn't them pure — how could he, poor creature ! I would give you a recipe if his drugs could be depended upon ; but they positively cannot. Suppose now, my dear ma'am, — suppose your little nerves got out of order, and I wished to give you something of an alluviating nature, I might wish to exhibit a small dose of hippopotamus, and most likely he, not having the article in his cornucopia, might give you vox populi. Now only fancy your swallowing vox populi instead of hippopotamus ! There 's no knowing what the consequence might be ; perhaps utter prostitution — prostitution of strength I mean : — only fancy ! I tell you, M'Garry is dangerous ; besides, M'Garry keeps the Post-office, — and how can a man mind the post and his profession ? — or, as the Squire most fassyetiously said the other day, ‘How can he be at his two posts at once?’ Ha, ha! Very good — wasn’t it? Capital, I think.—But, to be serious, M‘Garry’s dangerous: he ’d better throw his physic to the dogs, as the Bard of Devon says, for ’tis fit for no one else. You had better let me send you a little box of pills, and a bottle of that thing I sent you before ; they are patent medicines, and must be good. You liked the last—didn’t you ? Tastes rather strong, you say ; so much the better — make you strong : very nice though. It is an expensive medicine, rather ; but what o’ that in comparison to your precious health? Better than being poisoned with vox populi.’”

Thus would this impudent and ignorant vagabond talk his vile rubbish to the fools who would let him send them his patent medicines, and charge them in his bill.

When Sweeny saw Rory O’More getting drugs at M‘Garry’s, he asked him who was ill. Rory, not liking him, and aware of his prying nature, wished for reasons of his own that he should not know for whom they were intended; as he thought it possible the animal might pay a visit to the cottage on the plea of giving advice, and see the stranger; and, what would be worse, hear him raving too; and Rory's surmises as to the profession of his guest made him anxious that this should not be. He accordingly evaded all the questions of the medical attorney as well as he could, and left him without giving him any information on the subject. But this was quite enough to excite Sweeny's suspicion, and set his curiosity craving; and so he rode out the next day to pay Rory's home a visit, and ferret out the mystery. On arriving at the house, he hung his horse's bridle-reins over a hook near the door, and bolted into the cottage at once. Rory, his mother, and sister, were all there; therefore, it was a plain case that none of the family were ill.

"Good Morrow, widow!" said Sweeny in his politest manner—"glad to see you well, ma'am,—and you, Mary O'More—well and hearty ;— all well, I see—glad of it. I was afraid some one was sick—saw Rory getting drugs yesterday—just dropt in as I was coming by, to see could I offer any advice : who's sick ?”

“ Thank you, Mr. Sweeny, I’m obleeged,” said the widow coldly ; “ I jist wanted a thrifle o’ physic, and so Rory wint for it :” and she bustled about, evidently having no inclination to enter into conversation with him, and letting him see that such was her intention ; but Sweeny was not to be put off so.

“ Can I do anything in the way of advice, Mrs. O’More ?”

“ Yis, indeed, Mr. Sweeny, you can ; and I think I’ll be goin’ over to you, to ask about a little bit o’ law soon, for I’m having an alteration made in my lase.”

“ Yes, yes,—certainly—law business—certainly—always ready, Mrs. O’More : but I mean in the medical way,—you know I’m skilful in that way, Mrs. O’More—and as there’s some one sick here, if I can be of any use, I'll be most happy — most happy, Mrs. O'More."

The widow saw there was no evading the attorney, and so she said a traveller had been going the road, and was taken ill, and they took him in and put him to bed; but "it wouldn't signify, plase God! and he'd be well enough in a day or two."

"If I can be of any use, I'll see him with pleasure."

"Thank you, sir, but I gave him something myself that I know will do him good—obleeged to you all the same."

"Is he poor?" said Sweeny.

"I never asked him that," said the widow reproachfully.

"Of course—of course;—but then I mean, you might guess."

"Guess!" said Rory, who had been eyeing Sweeny all this time with a sidelong glance of contempt,—"Guess!—why, thin tare an ouns! do you think the man's a riddle or a conundherum, that we'd be guessin' at him?"

All the time this conversation was going on, Sweeny kept rolling his little grey eyes about him ; and at last he spied De Lacy's portmanteau, and approaching it directly, and laying hold of it, he said, " This is the traveller's portmanteau, I suppose ? "

" Well, and what if it is ? " said Rory.

" Oh, nothing—nothing," said Sweeny, who had turned it over and over to look for a name or initials ; but there were none : " no harm in my asking, I hope ? "

" Nor no good, either," said Rory.

" Only, by this portmanteau, the traveller is a gentleman, I perceive."

" Well, he 's not the worse of that," said Rory.

" Anything I can do for the gentleman, I 'll be most happy," said Sweeny, who always laid a gentleman under obligation if he could.

" Thank you, sir, but he 's very comfortable here, I can tell you, and sha 'n't want for anything," said the widow.

" I 've no doubt of that, Mrs. O'More ;—but if I could see him, perhaps I might be able to give some little advice. Is he in that room?" said Sweeny, pointing as he spoke.

"He's asleep, and mustn't be disturbed," said Rory.

Just at that moment De Lacy's raving took a noisy turn, and he became audible to Sweeny.

"There," said Sweeny, "he's awake,—now you can let me go in;" and he was advancing to the door, when Rory stepped between, and said the patient shouldn't be disturbed at the same time he turned towards his mother, and made a grimace, as much as to say, "Sweeny must not be admitted." The widow grinned and blinked her eyes, as much as to say, "He shall not."—"You see, Mr. Sweeny," said she, "the poor gentleman's ravin', and doesn't like strangers."

"Raving!—ho, ho!—fever—dangerous, Mrs. O'More,—take care, take care."

"I've taken every care, sir."

"But fever, Mrs. O'More;—have you given him feverescing drinks?"

" He has all he wants."

" You should write to his friends, and tell them ;—may die, you know ;—I'll write to them, if you like."

" And charge six-and-eightpence for it," said Rory aside.

" Do you know his name ? "

" No," said Rory very short ; " we didn't ax him any impid'nt questions."

" Rory, my man, don't be unreasonable, — don't be in a passion ;—maybe a person of consequence — his friends in a state of suspense.—He 's raving : now all you have to do is to open his valise and examine his papers, and find out who he is. I'll do it for you, if you like."

Rory's rage now burst its bounds. The prying impertinence of Sweeny he bore so long as it merely amounted to his personal annoyance ; but when he made the last proposition, Rory opened upon him furiously.

" Why, thin, do you take me for such a mane-sperited dog, that while a sick man was on his back, I'd turn spy and thief, and brake open his portmantle and hunt for his saycrets?"

" My dear Rory——!"

" Don't dear me!—Dear, indeed,—'faith! it's shape you howld me, if you think I'd do sitch a dirty turn,—to bethray the man undher my roof;—you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

" But it 's a common practice!"

" A common 'turney's practice maybe,—or a common thief's practice."

" Hillo, Rory!"

" Oh, to the devil I pitch you and your hillo!—I say, a common thief's practice, again,—to break locks or cut open bags, and pimp and spy;—faugh on the man would do the like! Throth, if I thought there was one dhrop o' blood in my body would consent to it, I'd open my veins till it was out. Oh, murther, murther,—to hear of sitch a scheming turn!—If I done such a rogue's thrick, I'd howld myself disgraced to the end of my days, and think myself only fit company for Judas."

Sweeny was dumb-founded before the torrent of Rory's honest indignation, and was about to make some shuffling reply, when Mary O'More entered the cottage, she having left it a moment before, and said, "Run, run, Mr. Sweeny! there's your horse has got his head out of the bridle, and is run into the field."

Now it was Mary herself who had loosened the bridle from the beast, and let him escape, for the purpose of getting rid of their troublesome visitor.

Sweeny cut short his discourse, and darted from the house, pursuing his horse into the field, where he arrived in time to see him rolling over in great glee, much to the benefit of a new saddle.

Sweeny shouted, "murder!" and it was some time before the horse could be caught, even with the assistance of Rory. When he was secured, the saddle was discovered to have been split by the horse's tumbles; and when Sweeny got into his seat and turned homewards, he saw Mary O'More showing her white teeth in a most undisguised laugh at the result of her trick, which Rory rejoiced in equally.

After De Lacy suffering under dangerous fever for some time, the eruption made its appearance, and he was soon out of danger. He had no other aid in his illness than that of the widow's simple remedies, which, backed by a good constitution, carried him through, and now quiet and patience were all that he required.

As soon as he recovered his senses, it was some time before he could perfectly understand how he came to be in Rory O'More's cottage ; but a few words from his kind host gradually gave the key to memory, and he was enabled to recall the circumstances that preceded his illness. After this he was for some time silent, and then he asked what was the day of the month. On being told, he knit his brow, and seemed to undergo some feelings of disappointment, to which an expression of great anxiety succeeded.

"O'More," said he at last, "shut the door. Come close to me ; I want to ask you a question, and I charge you, as you hope for salvation, to answer me truly. I know I have been out of my senses, and I suppose I talked a great deal while I was so. Now tell me honestly, did anything remarkable strike you in my raving?"

"Yes, there did, sir," said Rory, smiling at De Lacy, and looking straight into his eyes with that honest look that honesty alone can give.

There was a soothing influence to De Lacy in the expression of that smile and look, and a peculiar intelligence in them, that showed him Rory knew the drift of his question, by having fathomed the circumstances of his situation."

"I'm sure you guess what I am," said De Lacy.

"Shouldher arms, — whoo!" said Rory, laughing.

"De Lacy smiled faintly at Rory's mode of illustrating his knowledge.

"You are right," said De Lacy, "and you know I'm not a soldier of King George."

Rory sang, in a low tone,

"Viva la, the French is coming—
Viva la, our friends is throue;
Viva la, the French is coming—
What will the poor yeomen do?"

De Lacy nodded assent, and smiled, and, after a short pause, said, "You're a sharp fellow, O'More."

"I've been blunt enough with you, sir."

"Honest as the sun," said De Lacy. "Now tell me, do the women know anything about this?"

"Not a taste; they suspect you no more nor the child unborn: only, Mary says——"

"What?" said De Lacy, rather alarmed.

"That you're in love, sir,—beggin' your pardon."

"Oh! that's all. Well, she's right too. Why, you're a sharp family altogether."

"Divil a much sharpness in that," said Rory: "sure, whin there's the laste taste o' love goin', the wind o' the word is enough for a woman. Oh! let them alone for findin' out the soft side of a man's heart!—the greatest fool o' them all is wise enough in such matthers."

"O'More," said De Lacy, after another pause, "you're a united Irishman."

Rory smiled. "Now it's your turn to be sharp," said he.

"You are a united man, then?" said De Lacy.

"To the core of my heart," replied Rory with energy.

"Then my mind's at ease," said De Lacy; and he held out his hand to O'More, who gave his in return, and De Lacy shook it warmly.

"God be praised, sir!" said Rory; "but how does that set your mind at aise?"

"Because you can fulfil a mission for me, Rory, that otherwise must have failed;—that is, if you'll undertake it."

"Undhertake it!—I'd go to the four corners of the earth in a good cause."

"You're a brave fellow!" said De Lacy.

"But will you tell me, sir," said Rory, "is the French comin' in airnest to help us?"

"No doubt of it, Rory—and you shall be the joyful messenger of their coming by doing the errand I wish for."

"Oh! but that'll be the proud day for me, your honour!"

"Well, then, there's no time to lose. I asked you the day of the month a few minutes ago, and my heart sank within me when you told me the date; to-morrow I am bound by promise to be in the town of —, where an agent from France is waiting, who bears intelligence to Ireland. It is impossible for me to go;—now will you undertake the duty, Rory?"

"With all the veins o' my heart!" said Rory, "and be proud into the bargain."

"Go, then," said De Lacy, "to the town of —, and there on the quay there's a public-house."

"Faith, there is,—and more," said Rory.

"The public-house I mean bears a very odd sign."

"I'll be bound I know it," said Rory, whose national impatience would not wait for De Lacy's directions; "I'll engage it's the Cow and the Wheelbarrow."

"No," said De Lacy, who could not help smiling at the oddness of the combination in Rory's anticipated sign, "it is not; but one quite as queer: the Cat and Bagpipes."

"Oh, that's a common sign," said Rory.

"There are a great many very queer things common in Ireland," said De Lacy, who even in his present weakened state could not resist his habitual love of remark. "You are well acquainted, I see, with the town," he continued.

"Indeed, and I'm not," said Rory; "I never was there but wanst, and that happened to be on the quay, by the same token, where I remarked the Cow and the Wheelbarrow, for it's a sign I never seen afore, and is mighty noticeable."

"But that is not the sign of the house you are to go to, remember."

"Oh, by no manes, sir; the Cat and Bag-pipes is my mark."

"Yes! and there about the hour of six in the evening you will see a party of three men."

"But if there's two parties of three?" said Rory.

"You can distinguish our friends by contriving, in the most natural way you can,—I mean, so as not to excite observation from any but those who will understand and answer your signal,—to say, One, two, three, in their hearing; and if those whom I expect you to meet should be there, you will be spoken to by them, and then you must introduce into whatever you say to them these words, They were very fine ducks. They will then leave the public-house, and you may trust yourself to follow wherever they lead."

"Now, how am I to make sure that they are right?" said Rory.

" You have my word for their being trusty," said De Lacy.

" Oh, sir, sure it's not your word I'd be doubting ; but I mane, how am I to make sure that it is the right men I spake to ?"

" Their noticing your remark will be sufficient ; but, as a further assurance, they can return you the united man's signal and grip. Give me your hand," said De Lacy, and he clasped the extended palm of Rory.

" That's the grip," said Rory, " sure enough. Why, thin, how did you come by that, sir ?" said Rory ; " tare alive ! are the French united Irishmen ?"

" Not exactly," said De Lacy, smiling ; " but the chosen know your signs. Now I've told you all that's requisite for your mission : when you give these signs, they whom you'll meet will tell you what it is requisite for me to know, and you can bring me back the intelligence."

" I've no time to lose," said Rory ; " I must be off to-morrow by the dawn."

"Will your mother or sister suspect anything from your absence?"

"Why, sir, the thruth is, neither mother nor sisther ever questioned me about my incomin's or outgoin's; though they have, av coarse, observed I was not always reg'lar, and women is sharp enough in sitch matthers; but they suspect something is going on in the counthry; how could they help it? but they know it is in a good cause, and that they have no business to meddle with it, and so the fewer questions they ask, they think it is the betther. They know men must do what becomes men; and though the mother and sisther loves me as well as ever a son or a brother was loved in this wide world, they would rather see me do what a man ought to do, and die, than skulk and live undher disgrace."

De Lacy was touched by this simple expression of the chivalrous feeling which existed throughout this humble family, and, after Rory assuring him he would do his mission, and telling him to 'keep never minding' to the mother, he took his instructions once more, and recommended De Lacy to go to sleep.

It was evening ; so Rory bade his guest good-night. “ You won’t see me again till afther I come back ; make yourself aisy, sir. The thing will be done, depend upon that : above all, say nothing to the mother ; she ’ll ask me no questions, and I ’ll tell her no lies.” With this wise saying, Rory left De Lacy, who soon slept, from the fatigue which the excitement he had just gone through produced.

CHAPTER VIII.

"BRITANNIA RULES THE WAVES."

IT was in the grey of a fine autumnal morning, about a fortnight previously to the scene and time just recorded, that a swift lugger was seen dashing the spray from her beautiful bows as she sailed through a fleet of stately men-of-war that lay in the Texel. The lugger made for the shore, and when close in, dropped her anchor; and her small boat being lowered from her stern, three men entered it, and it was pulled swiftly to the beach. To one who knew not that a craft like the lugger required a numerous crew, it might have been supposed, when those three men left her side, that every living thing had departed from her; for the stillness which prevailed within her was profound. There she lay on the placid water, quiet as the element she floated on, without a sign or a sound to indicate that she was the den of many a daring ruffian.

About noon the boat reapproached the lugger, with two additional persons, and after hailing her, and remaining a few minutes under her quarter, again pushed off, and made for the centre of the fleet, where the flag of Admiral De Winter floated from the mast of the Vryheid,—a splendid seventy-four.

Three persons from the boat went up the side of the admiral's ship, two of whom were admitted to the admiral's cabin; the third, the commander of the lugger, waited on the deck until those he brought from the shore should command his presence below. And these two were persons, whose names are well known in the eventful history of the period, and on their heads was the price of blood,—Theobald Wolfe Tone, and Lewines: the former, an exile for some time from his country ; and the other, more recently an envoy from the executive of the disaffected party in Ireland. Tone had obtained rank in the French army, and was at this moment on the état major of the armament destined for the invasion of the kingdom of Great Britain ; though at what point that invasion might take place was not as yet decided ;—it being matter of dispute whether the expedition should land on the English coast, or in Ireland ; whether it should strike at the vitals of Great Britain, or assail her from the extremities.

General Hoche, who was only second in fame to Bonaparte, was anxious to do something brilliant, while the fame of his rival's Italian campaigns made Europe ring with wonder ; and as the prevalence of contrary winds had prevented the expedition sailing for some weeks for Ireland, he made the daring proposal of landing in Lincolnshire and marching direct on London. A year before, his expedition which sailed from Brest for Ireland was utterly defeated by contrary winds ; and as the same element seemed, as usual, to interpose a providential barrier between England and her foes, he, with that impatient thought so characteristic of genius, suggested the idea that as the wind did not blow in favour of the course they wanted to steer, they should make it subservient to another purpose, descend on the most open quarter, and trust to the fortune of war ; for he burned that some great achievement of his should prevent his name being overshadowed by the freshly-springing laurels of Napoleon Bonaparte.

Against this preposterous notion of carrying England by a coup de main, Tone had always argued strenuously ; but he found such a singular ignorance of the state of England, as well as Ireland, to exist amongst the French, that it was with great difficulty he could make General Hoche listen to a word against his newly-conceived expedition. It was, therefore, with great pleasure he had the letter of De Lacy, bearing so strongly on this point, put into his hands that morning by the commander of the lugger, and he lost no time in laying it before the authorities in command of the expedition, to dissuade them from a course that he knew could be no other than ruinous.

When he and Lewines entered the cabin of the admiral, Generals Hoche and Daendells were looking over a map of England ; and Admiral De Winter, with his second-in-command, Admiral Storey, were examining charts of the British Channel and the North Sea.

" You see I've not given it up yet," said Hoche vivaciously to Tone.

" I perceive you have not, general," said the latter ; " but I think this will decide you :" and he presented to him the letter of De Lacy.

Hoche pounced upon it, and began to devour its contents. He passed rapidly on, till, stopping suddenly, he asked, " Who is this from ? "

Tone informed him it was from an agent of General Clark, who had been commissioned to inquire into the truth of all the statements Tone had made to the Directory.

"I remember," said Hoche; and he resumed his reading.

A conversation ensued in the mean time between the admirals and the Irish emissaries, until it was interrupted by Hoche exclaiming impatiently, "Que diable! What have carved ceilings and handsome apartments to do with the matter? His oak ceiling is only good for burning! What nonsense!" And he threw down the letter contemptuously.

"Pray, go on, general," said Tone. "There is a good deal of detail, certainly, in the communication; but if the writer has been careful and elaborate in his observations, it is only fair to read them all to arrive at a just estimate of his judgment.

Hoche continued the reading of the letter, and as he proceeded, his face became more thoughtful, he read with deeper attention; and when he had finished the perusal, he laid down the letter in silence, as if he had not the heart to say, "I must give up my expedition," although he felt it was hopeless.

" You see, general," said Tone, " the expedition to Ireland is the only thing."

" Whenever it can sail there," said Hoche.

" That may be a month," said Daendells.

" Or to-morrow," said Tone.

" This south-westerly wind is blowing as if it had set in for it," said the admiral, shaking his head, as if he doubted Tone's hopeful anticipation.

" The troops have been now embarked nearly a month," said General Daendells, " and though amply provisioned for the probable necessities of the expedition, it is impossible their stores can last much longer; and whenever they become exhausted, I doubt how far our government would deem it prudent to advance further supplies."

" General Daendells," said Hoche, " it has appeared to me, lately, that the Batavian republic seems to have a jealousy that her army should be led by a general of France in an affair that promises so much glory, and I should not wonder that much further delay in the sailing of the expedition might prevent this noble undertaking altogether. Now, I would not for the glory of Cæsar that my personal fame should interfere with the great cause of universal freedom ; and if you think that your legislative assembly would be more willing to pursue this enterprise if it were under the command of one of its own generals, I will withdraw my pretensions to the command, and give all the chance of the glory to you."

" You are a noble fellow," said Daendells, extending his hand to Hoche ; " there may be some truth in what you say, and I shall never forget this act of generosity on your part, for none can deny that you, from your efforts made and disappointments endured in this cause, deserve to reap all the laurels that may be mine in the result. This is the greatest of your conquests,— you have triumphed over your ambition !"

Tone was affected almost to tears — he could scarcely speak ; but, struggling with his emotion, he said, " General, my country will never forget this noble conduct on your part. We knew how brave you are, but we did not know how generous!"

"Who brought this letter?" said Hoche, wishing to turn the conversation.

"De Welskein, the smuggler," said Tone; "and he wishes to know whether he may promise speedy aid to the sufferers in Ireland, for they are beginning to be impatient of it."

"The moment the wind permits, they shall have succour," said Daendells. "Is it not so, admiral?" said he to De Winter.

"Certainly," answered the admiral. "Is the smuggler on board?" added he, addressing Tone.

"Yes, admiral."

"Then I wish to speak to him;" and the smuggler was ordered into the admiral's presence.

De Welskein was a Frenchman, though bearing a Dutch name: he was one of the many desperate characters that the French revolution produced. A fellow of loose habits and desperate fortunes, he took to smuggling, as the readiest mode of indulging the one and repairing the other: he had also a love of finesse, and a spirit of intrigue, that this sort of life enabled him to indulge in; and he was the most active of the agents in carrying on intelligence between France and Ireland at that period;—not that he cared for the Irish, not that he had a moral sensibility within him to desire the liberation of the veriest slave,—but that it gave him an opportunity to smuggle and intrigue. Many a turbulent spirit in Ireland who longed for an outbreak of rebellion, and who looked to France for aid, courted Monsieur De Welskein as emissary from the land of promise, and he made them, through this hold upon them, more ready instruments in his smuggling speculations.

Deficient though De Welskein was in any moral appreciation of the beauty of freedom, he babbled in the jargon of his time about it, and shouted ‘Vive la liberté!’ because his liberté meant the absence of all restraint, human or divine; and he had a sort of confused notion that a revolution was glorious, and that it was the business of the grande nation to revolutionise the world in general, but Ireland in particular, because it gave him a good opportunity for smuggling brandy and tobacco.

There was a species of melodramatic fancy about the fellow too—a propensity for romance and adventure, that his connexion with Ireland gratified. Besides, it indulged his vanity, as, in his present situation, Monsieur Eugene St. Foix de Welskein was no small personage in his own opinion : he rhodomontaded about the fate of empires and the destinies of nations, as if he were a sucking Jupiter, or one of the French Directory.

His names too were a source of rejoicing to him: Eugene St. Foix. The former he inherited from his father ; the latter was the maiden name of his mother, who was a washerwoman. De Welskein he did not much like ; so that his companions, when they wished to vex him, called him by his surname, while in moments of friendship they addressed him as Eugene ; but when they courted him, the heroic title of St. Foix was the one they preferred. To be sure, they sometimes called him, behind his back, Sans foi ; but in his presence he was fond of having his courage celebrated under the name of Sans Peur : so that St. Foix sans peur was a flattering address sometimes made to him :— but though St. Foix was certainly sans peur, he was not sans reproche.

When De Welskein entered the cabin, Admiral De Winter asked him, had he seen the English fleet ?

He answered, that he had passed them in the night.

“ Then you could not count the number of their ships ? ” said the admiral.

“ I was sufficiently near in the morning to see them,” said the smuggler, “ and I think they are eighteen sail.”

“ Eighteen ! —are you sure ? ”

“ I think, eighteen ; I ’m almost sure.”

“ Frigates, or line-of-battle ? ”

"Most line-of-battle."

"I see he has observed them," said the admiral, "for I could perceive, even from the harbour, with a glass, that they were all line-of-battle: — but I could only make out fifteen; they must have been reinforced. Some of their ships were in mutiny at the Nore; perhaps the mutiny has been suppressed, and that accounts for the increase of numbers."

"That's unlucky," said Tone.

"How unlucky, sir?" said Storey.

"As long as our fleet had a superiority, there was a chance we could force our passage; but —"

"Sir," said Storey, "you mistake very much if you think we would shrink from contending with an equal, or even superior, number of the enemy. I wish for nothing better than to be broadside to broadside with them."

This was the bravado of the man who, in about a month after, deserted De Winter in his engagement with that identical fleet, and literally ran away with his division of the Dutch force from the enemy he vaunted himself so eager to engage.—So much for braggarts!

“Pardon me, admiral,” said Tone; “I hope neither you nor Admiral De Winter”—and he bowed deferentially to that gallant officer, as if it were to him rather than to Storey he apologised—“I hope you do not suppose me so unworthy as to undervalue the bravery of the Dutch navy, at the same time that I consider it a matter of importance we should reach Ireland without an engagement, as by that means our force will be undiminished; and I wish that the army landed should be as large as possible, for the affair will be the sooner decided, and thus an effusion of blood will be spared,—and I wish from my heart that in my poor country as little blood as possible may be shed.”

“Bah!” said Hoche; “you can't make omelettes without breaking of eggs.”

“Adjutant-general,” said De Winter to Tone, “ I do not misapprehend you : there is no denying that the English are a brave enemy, and Admiral Duncan is a gallant and able officer. I shall not seek an encounter with him until I land your expedition,— but I shall certainly not shun it.”

Thus spoke the man of true courage, who fought his ships gallantly in the subsequent action, even after the defection of the braggart who deserted him.

Tone tapped General Hoche on the shoulder, and led him apart for a few words in private, the door being open that led to the stern gallery, they walked forth, and Tone began an energetic address, requesting the general to dissuade the admiral as much as possible from an engagement with the English fleet. “ Let the troops be landed in Ireland,” said he : “ on the land you are invincible, as the English are on the seas. Fate seems to have given to them the dominion of the ocean. Mark me—my words are prophetic—so sure as this fleet shall engage the English, so surely shall it be beaten !”

"De Winter is an able officer," said Hoche.

"He is," said Tone, "and a brave man, I am certain, from his moderate manner; while I doubt very much the courage of that flourishing gentleman. But have we not the example of repeated engagements to show us that Great Britain is an overmatch for every nation on the seas? and it makes my blood boil to think that while her fleets are freely manned by Irishmen, the land that gives them birth groans beneath her oppression. Ireland helps to gather laurels for Britain's brows, but not a leaf of the chaplet is given to her; she shares in winning the victories that enrich and aggrandize the Queen of the Ocean, but is allowed no portion of the fame or the prosperity."

"Be not thus agitated," said Hoche soothingly, touched by the fierce enthusiasm with which Tone uttered the latter part of his address: "when once this armament lands in Ireland, there is an end of Great Britain's domination."

"Ay, when it lands," said Tone, with a voice in which impatience and hopelessness were strangely blended. “ Oh ! ” said he, stretching out his hands to the expanse of sea and sky before him — “ Oh ! ye elements — ye mysterious agents of Heaven ! why do ye interpose your potent shield of air and foam between England and her foes ? You blasted the Armada of Spain ; I saw you scatter the ships of France at Bantry ; and now this gallant fleet, with fifteen thousand chosen men, who burn for the liberation of my country, is chained here by an adverse wind for a whole month ! Ireland, my country, I fear you are doomed ! ”

His hands dropped to his side, his head sank on his chest, and he stood with his eyes fixed on the ground.

“ Rally, man — rally ! ” said Hoche, slapping him on the shoulder : “ why, Adjutant-general, I have never seen you thus before ! ”

“ Whenever I think of the fate of that unhappy country, it breaks my heart ! But I ’ve done : — only, for God’s sake, General Hoche, dissuade them from a sea-fight; we are ruined if they attempt it."

Hoche and Tone now re-entered the cabin. They found De Winter and Daendells giving instructions to the smuggler. De Winter desired him to put himself in the way of the English fleet, and give them some false information. It was planned that De Welskein should pass the English squadron in the night, and towards morning sail back again, as if he came up Channel, and tell the English admiral that he saw a French fleet at the Channel's mouth; this might give him an idea that the Brest fleet had got out to sea, which would serve to divide his attention, and possibly draw him farther off the coast, and leave a passage from the Texel more open, in case the wind should change so as to favour such a movement.

General Daendells told him to assure the Irish of speedy succour, for that fifteen thousand men were embarked for that service, and only waited a fair wind to sail. A few lines to De Lacy, from Hoche, was all the writing the smuggler bore, and he left the ship on his mission.

Such were the plans that were proposed ; such were the promises made. What was the result ?

The wind continued foul a fortnight longer ; in all, six weeks. The provisions for so large a number of troops, as well as seamen, became exhausted ; the troops were relanded ; the expedition to Ireland was given up,—and England again was spared the danger of a formidable invasion into a disaffected portion of her kingdom.

The night the troops were disembarked, Tone went to his tent with a heavy heart : the next morning he saw the pennants of the fleet turned towards England.

The breeze which the day before would have made his blood dance, had he felt it on the deck of the Vryheid, now only made his heart sick ; he stood on the beach like one possessed. After remaining motionless for some minutes, he stamped fiercely, clenched his teeth, struck his forehead with his hand, and walked rapidly away ; but ere he descended a slight declivity that shut out the bay, he turned round and cast a look of despair towards his country.

Thus ended the second expedition undertaken for the invasion of Ireland : and the gallant Hoche, within a month after, was no more — cut off in his prime of manhood and career of glory by the hand of the assassin !*

And what was the fate of the fleet ?

Admiral De Winter, the October following, sailed from the Texel, met the English squadron under Admiral Duncan, and fought like a hero ; — but Storey deserted him. De Winter, nevertheless, maintained a fierce engagement against superior numbers : but the prophecy of Tone was fulfilled ; after a well-contested fight, the Dutch struck their colours, and the flag of England again floated triumphantly over the seas.

* Hoche's life was attempted more than once. His death was attributed to slow poison.

CHAPTER IX.

THE PRETTY GIRL MILKING HER COW.

“ I saw a young damsel,—’twas Noreen ;—
Her ringlets did carelessly flow.
Oh ! how I adore you, ma vourneen,
Ma colleen dhas crutheen na mbho.”

RORY O'MORE left his cottage at an early hour the morning after his conversation with De Lacy. For a few miles he followed the by-road that led from his house, and then struck into a path through some fields, for the purpose of making the high-road which was the direct way to the place of his destination.

As he was walking briskly on, looking neither to the right nor the left, but quite absorbed in the contemplation of the business he had undertaken, his attention was suddenly arrested by hearing one of those quaint and sportive melodies of his country sung by a sweet voice. Rory paused ;—he recognised the tones that had so often made his heart thrill with pleasure,—and running up the gentle hill before him, he beheld, as he topped the summit on the other side of the hillock, seated under the shade of a hawthorn hedge, a beautiful peasant girl, whose song proceeded merrily while she was milking her cows.

Kathleen Regan was sitting with her back towards the point whence Rory approached ; so that he was enabled, unperceived by her, to gaze with pleasure on her sweet figure and listen to her sportive song.

There's a lad that I know; and I know that he Speaks softly to me,

The cushla-ma-chree!

He's the pride of my heart, and he loves me well;

But who the lad is, I'm not going to tell.

He's as straight as a rush, and as bright as the stream

That around it doth gleam,—

Oh! of him how I dream!

I'm as high as his shoulder—the way that I know

Is, he caught me one day, just my measure to show.

He whisper'd a question one day in my ear:

When he breathed it, oh dear!

How I trembled with fear!

What the question he ask'd was, I need not confess;

But the answer I gave to the question was, "Yes."

His eyes they are bright, and they looked so kind

When I was inclined

To speak my mind!

And his breath is so sweet—oh, the rose's is less!

And how I found it out,—why I leave you to guess.

The scene was one to excite the imagination and charm the senses of one less keen to such pleasures than Rory. He could catch the soft scent of the morning breath of the cows, vieing in fragrance with the woodbine that was peeping through the hedge; at the same time that he could hear the sweet voice of the girl he loved, and see her bright ringlets curl down her graceful neck and beautifully-rounded shoulders.

He watched her for some moments in silent admiration, and then stealing softly behind her and suddenly uttering "Wow!" the girl started, and in her moment of surprise Rory caught her in his arms and snatched a kiss. A hearty box on his ear followed the salute, with the exclamation of,

“ You devil ! how dar you !”

“ I lave you to guess,” said Rory, laughing.

“ You’re mighty impudent, so you are, Rory.”

“ Arrah ! how could I help it, Kathleen darlin’ ?” said Rory with a look of admiration that would have softened the anger of even a more cruel beauty than Kathleen ; — a look that appealed more strongly to the self-love of the woman than the liberty taken had startled her modesty.

“ You’re very impudent, so you are,” said Kathleen, settling her hair, that had been tossed into a most becoming confusion over her face in the struggle.

“ You often towld me that before,” said Rory.

“ It does not do you much good, thin,” said Kathleen. “ You hear me, but you don’t heed me.”

“ Why, if you go to that, how can I help myself. Sure you might as well keep the ducks from the wather, or the bees from the flowers, as my heart from you, Kathleen."

"Now, Rory, lave off!"

"By this light, Kathleen!"

"Now don't be goin' on, Rory!"

"There's not a girl—"

"Now, don't be makin' a fool o' yourself and me too," said Kathleen.

"If makin' you my own would be to make a fool of you, thin it's a fool I'd make you, sure enough," said Rory.

"Rory," said Kathleen rather sadly, "don't be talkin' this way to me,—it's good for neither of us."

"Kathleen darling!" said Rory, "what's the matther with you?" and he approached her and gently took her hand.

"Nothing," said she, "nothing,—only it's foolishness."

"Don't call honest love, foolishness, Kathleen dear. Sure, why would we have hearts in our bodies if we didn't love? Sure, our hearts would be no use at all without we wor fond of one another. Arrah ! what's the mather with you, Kathleen?"

"I must go home, Rory ;—let me go, Rory dear," said she with a touching tone of sadness on the dear, as she strove to disengage from her waist the hand that Rory had stolen round it.

"No, I won't let you go, Kathleen, maourneen," said Rory, with passion and pathos, as he held her closer in his embrace. "Now or never, Kathleen, I must have your answer. You are the girl that is, and ever was, in the very core of my heart, and I'll never love another but yourself. Don't be afraid that I'll change; I'm young, but I'm thtrue: the blessed sun that sees us both this minit is not thruer; and he's a witness to what I say to you now, Kathleen asthore, that you're the pulse o' my heart, and I'll never rest aisy till you're my wife."

Kathleen could not speak. She trembled while Rory made his last address to her; her lip quivered as he proceeded; two big tear-drops sprang to her eyes, and hung on their long dark lashes, when he called her ‘pulse of his heart;’ but when he named the holy name of wife, she fell upon his neck and burst into a violent flood of tears.

Rory felt this was a proof of his being beloved; but it was not the way in which, from Kathleen’s sportive nature, he thought it likely she would accept a husband to whom there was no objection; and while he soothed the sobbing of the agitated girl, he wondered what could be the cause of her violent emotion. When she became calm, he said, “Kathleen dear, don’t be vexed with me if I took you too sudden:—you know I’m none of the coolest, and so forgive me, jewel! I’ll say no more to you now;—only give me an answer at your own good time, my darling.”

Kathleen wiped the tears from her eyes, and said, “No, Rory dear: you’ve been plain with me, and I’ll be plain with you. As for myself——” she looked up in his eyes, and their soft and confiding expression, and the gentle pressure of the hand that accompanied the look, told more than the words could have done which her maiden modesty forbade her utter.

" You love me, then ?" said Rory with delighted energy ; and he pressed her to his heart while she yielded her lips to the pressure of a kiss which the fire of pure love had refined from the dross of passion.

" Oh, Rory,—but my brother Shan ?"

" Well, what o' that ?" said Rory.

" Oh, you know,—you know," said Kathleen mournfully.

" Yis, Mary didn't take to him ; but sure that's no rayson."

" Oh ! you don't know him !"

" We've been rather cool, to be sure, since, but I never put coolness between me and him ; and if my sisther couldn't like him, sure that's no rayson to put between you and me."

" Oh, Rory, Shan is very dark ; and I'm afeard."

"But why should he prevent our comin' together? Sure, isn't there your mother?"

"Oh, but she's afraid of him, and——"

"But how do you know he would make objections?"

The poor girl blushed scarlet as she said, "Why, to tell you the thruth, Rory, and it's no matther now that you know it, afther what's passed between us this morning; but Shan suspected I liked you, and he warned me agen it, and swore a bitter oath, that if ever I'd think of you, he'd——"

"What?" said Rory.

"Curse me," said Kathleen; and she shudder'd as she said it.

"God forgive him!" said Rory solemnly. "But never mind, Kathleen; I'll meet him, and I'll speake him fair, and tell him the thruth. And when I speake to him like a man, he can't be less of a man, and he wouldn't be of so dark a heart to keep spite agen me because my sisther didn't love him."

"It's the kind and generous heart you have, Rory; but I'm afeard it would be no use: at all events, don't be in a hurry about it; wait a bit, and maybe when he comes across some other girl that will wane his heart from the owld love, he may be aisier about it; but at this present, Rory dear, don't purtend that you love me, nor let on what you said to me this morning."

"It's hard to hide what's in the heart," said Rory; "for even if the tongue doesn't bethray you, it may peep out of your eyes."

"But we shan't meet often," said Kathleen; "so there will be the less danger of that."

"That's hard, too," said Rory. "But, Kathleen, will you——" he could not finish the sentence, but Kathleen caught his meaning and said,

"You couldn't say the words, Rory,—you were going to say, will I be thrue to you? Oh, Rory dear! I have given you my heart, because I couldn't help it, and I trust to you that you have given me yours; and, oh! don't take it away from me! I must hide my love for a time. I'll hide it as a miser would hide his gold; and oh, Rory! don't let me find the treasure gone when I may venture to show it to the day."

"Kathleen darling! while there's life in my heart, it is you are the queen of it."

"Go, now," said Kathleen; "go,—don't stay longer here; I wouldn't have you seen for the king's ransom."

"May the Heavens bless and keep you!" said Rory; "one more kiss, my own—own girl;" and clasping her in his arms, they bade each other farewell.

Rory hurried on with a rapid step that accorded with the tumult of his feelings, and was soon lost to Kathleen's sight. She looked after him while he remained within view, and then resumed her occupation; but it was in silence. The sportive song had ceased—the light-heartedness of the girl had passed away even with the consciousness of a deeper pleasure. Her task ended, she took up her pail, and went her way homewards, but not with the elastic step with which she had trodden the wild flowers on her outgoing.

When Rory gained the high-road, he pursued his way mechanically towards the place of his destination, without a thought of the immediate business he had in hand. His brain was in a whirl, and his heart in a blaze; and love and Kathleen Regan were the objects of his thoughts, and not conspiracies and his mysterious guest.

His approach to the town, however, reminded him of the object of his mission, and he proceeded at the appointed hour to the public-house indicated by De Lacy. It was market-day in the town, so that the public-house was more crowded than on ordinary occasions; and Rory, when he entered, saw many persons engaged in drinking porter and whiskey, but mostly the latter. He cast his eyes about to see if such a group as he was instructed to look for was there, and more than one party of three was present; he therefore had to exercise his sagacity in selecting which of the groups was the one to test by his signal,—and he was not long in deciding. It was at the further end of the room, where a small square window admitted as much light as could find its way through some panes of greenish glass with bulls' eyes in the middle of them, covered with dust, that three men were seated at a dirty table where a congregation of flies were finishing a pot of porter. The aspect of one of the men struck Rory to be “outlandish,” as he would have said himself, and the quick and restless twinkle of his dark eye spoke of a more southern climate. To this group Rory approached, and looking round, as it were to see where he should sit, he asked permission of the party to take share of their box—for the room was divided into such compartments. They made room for him; and he, taking up the empty quart-pot on whose dregs the flies were regaling, knocked loudly with it on the table and started the buzzing nuisances from their banquet, and being driven from their pewter palace, they alighted on the various little pools and meandering streams of various liquids that stood upon the filthy table, which seemed to be left to them as a sort of patrimony, as the fallen dates are to the wanderers in the East. The tender-hearted sthreel who was the Hebe of the house would not have robbed the poor flies of their feast for the world, by wiping the table. Charity is a great virtue!

This dirty handmaiden came in answer to Rory's thumping of the quart-pot on the board.

“ Loose were her tresses seen,
Her zone unbound.”

Her foot was unsandalled, too ; in short, she was, as Rory remarked to his neighbour beside him, “ loose and careless like the leg of a pot.”

“ What do yiz want ?” says Hebe..

“ Something to dhrink,” says Rory.

“ Is it a pot, a pint, or a crapper ?” says Hebe.

“ I ’ll jist take the cobwebs out o’ my throat with a pint first,” says Rory.

“ I ’ll sarve you immadiently,” says Hebe, who took up the quart, and to save time she threw out the dregs of the liquor it had contained, on the floor, and then held it up inverted in a most graceful manner, that it might drain itself clean for the next customer; so that her course might be tracked up and down the room by the drippings of the various vessels, and thus she, “did her spiritting gently, dropping odours, dropping wine,” ale, and sper’ts.

She returned soon with a pint of porter to Rory, who took out a shilling to pay for it. “I’ll throuble you for the change, my dear,” said he.

Off she went again to get the change, and after some time, again returned, bearing two quarts of porter in one hand, and a jug of punch hanging between the fore finger and thumb of the other, while a small roll of tobacco and a parcel of halfpence were clutched in the remaining fingers. The liquids and the tobacco she deposited before a party that sat in a box opposite to Rory, and then, advancing to him, she flopped the halfpence down on the table before him, and putting her hand to her mouth, pulled out of it a piece of tin which she was pleased to call sixpence, and sticking it on the top of the halfpence, she said, "There's your change, sir."

"It's a tinker you have to make change for you, I b'lieve," said Rory.

"How is it a tinker?" said the damsel.

"Oh, I wouldn't take that piece of tin from you for the world," said Rory? "you might want it to stop a hole in a saucepan, and maybe it's coming afther me you'd be for it."

"I'd be long sorry to folly you," said the damsel, saucily, and turning away.

"See, young woman," said Rory — "don't be in sitch a hurry if you plaze—I gave you a good hog,* and I'll throuble you for a good taisther."

"I haven'ta betther to give you, sir — barrin, halfpence."

"Well, I'm noways proud, so the halfpence will do for me; good copper is betther than bad silver, any day."

* The shilling and sixpence were called by the lower orders "hog" and "tester."

The state of the silver currency in Ireland at this period was disgraceful — so bad, that it left the public almost at the mercy of the coiners. When the Warwickshire Militia went to Ireland, many of the privates, having been workmen in Birmingham, were very smart hands at the practice, and many stories are current of their doings in this line. Amongst others, it is stated that a party of these men in a public-house offered some bad money for what they had drunk; but the publican being on his guard, as their habits in this way were becoming notorious, refused several shillings one after another. The soldier who offered them said the dealer in liquor was over-particular; but he retorted, that they were so well known for their tricks, it was necessary to be cautious. “Well,” said the soldier at last, “here then, since nothing else will do ;” and he threw down another coin, and a very good-looking one it was. The landlord examined it for a while, but at last it was rejected. “What !” said the soldier, “nor not that neither !” “No,” said the landlord. So a good shilling was obliged to be produced at last, and as the party left the house, the discomfited hero was heard to say, "Well, I never know'd one o' Tom's make, to miss before."

The girl brought back Rory the value of the sixpence in copper—or rather, much more than its value ; and then Rory commenced reckoning his change, which was the means he had decided on for throwing out his signal. So, spreading the halfpence before him he, began—

"One, two, three—there's some sense in good halfpence ; one, two, three—jist as if I was to rob you of your tin, my good girl ; one, two, three — phoo ! murdher ! I'm mixin' them all."

"Arrah will you never be done reckonin' them !" said Hebe impatiently ; "one ud think 'twas a hundher poun' you wor countin', let alone change of a hog. I'm thinkin', it's no great credit to your schoolmaster you are."

"Fair and aisy goes far in a day," said Rory, again commencing to count his change.

"One, two, three ;" and while he spoke, he looked at the dark-eyed man, in whose face he fancied he caught something of an expression of the intelligence of his meaning, and then he proceeded with his reckoning and dismissed the girl.

One of the men now addressed him and said, "You are particular in counting your change."

"Yes, indeed I am," said Rory, "and I'll tell you the reason why : because I lost some money the other day by not being particular in that same, when I was buying some ducks."

The dark-eyed man looked very sharply on Rory as he proceeded.

"To be sure, I didn't mind the loss much, for the ducks was worth the money. They wor very fine ducks."

A still keener glance from the dark-eyed man followed Rory's last words, and he rose immediately, and left the public house ; his two companions did so likewise, and Rory lost no time in following them. On reaching the door, he saw them standing together a few paces removed from the house, and on seeing him appear they walked down the quay until they arrived at a corner, where looking back to see that he followed, they turned up the street. Rory tracked them, and at another turn the same practice was observed by his conductors, whom he continued to follow, dodging them through many an intricate winding, until arriving at a very narrow alley, they turned for the last time, and when Rory reached the spot, he perceived them about half-way up the passage standing at the mouth of a cellar ; and the moment he appeared, they all suddenly descended. He followed fast upon them, and going down a steep and broken stair, entered a low door which was closed the moment he had passed it, and he found himself in total darkness.

CHAPTER X.

IN WHICH RORY HEARS AND SEES MORE THAN HE BAR-GAINED FOR, AND FINDS IN THE CONCLUSION THE TRUTH OF THE PROVERB, THAT PROVIDENCE NEVER SHUTS ONE DOOR WITHOUT OPENING ANOTHER.

WHILE spots of red and green were dancing before Rory's eyes by his sudden immersion from light into darkness, a voice close beside him said,

"Ver glaad to see you."

"God spare you your eyesight!" said Rory : "I wish I could return the compliment to you."

Rory heard a low laugh in another tone, and then the former voice spoke again :

"Whaat ! you no glaad to see me ?"

"Faith, I would be very glad to see you ; but how can I see you in the dark ?"

"Ho ! ho ! I see, you fonee feylow—ha, ha !"

"Strek a light," said another voice.

"Wait a minit—I'm gettin' the tendher-box," was the answer.

The foreign voice again said, addressing Rory,

"You air wailcome."

"Thank you kindly," said Rory ; "give us your fist."

"Vaut you say ?"

"Give us your fist."

"He's biddin' you shake hands wid him," said a voice that had not yet spoken ; and Rory thought it was one he should know, though where he had heard it he could not remember.

"Oh !" said the foreigner, "donnez-moi la main."

"No, I dunna any man," said Rory.

"Bah ! shek han' wis me !" said the voice.

Rory now stretched out his hand, and encountered an extended palm which grasped his and exchanged with him the grip of the United Irishman.

This satisfied Rory all was right, and he now waited with patience for the light. The sound of a flint and steel, followed by a shower of sparks, showed that the process of illumination was going forward ; the tinder soon became ignited, and the sharp sound of blowing was soon followed by the lighting of a match — and the first face that its lurid glare fell upon was that of Shan Regan.

Rory started : he was the last person he expected to meet, and certainly the last he could have wished to see in that place. A coolness for some time had existed between them, as the reader already knows ; and though Rory fully intended to do all in his power to remove it, and to meet Regan for that purpose as often as he could, yet on such an occasion as the present he could have wished him absent. His presence there, it is true, showed him to be engaged in the same cause as Rory, and one at the first glance might suppose that this would have facilitated a reconciliation between them ; but on closer examination we shall find this not to be the case. - In all conspiracies where men are linked together in a cause whose penalty is death, private friendship is desirable amongst its members, at least in its early stages, where fidelity is essential to its existence. Personal foes may fight side by side in the same cause when once a conspiracy arrives at its outbreak ; but in its secret preparatory councils, a man recoils from the contact of any but a friend.

It was the consciousness of this fact, perhaps, that led to the ingenious construction of the plan by which the heads of the Society of United Irishmen contrived to organise a great portion of Ireland. The system was this : There was a Chief Committee of twelve; each of these twelve was the head of another twelve, but between each knot of twelve there was no acquaintance — they were totally distinct from each other ; so that an extensive ramification of union existed in parties of twelve, each obeying its own superior, through whom, alone, all commands and plans were conveyed. Each knot was thus a little band of friends, and from their distinctness, the secret was the more likely to be kept. It will be seen that by this means the Head Committee organised one hundred and forty-four members, whose knots of twelve each being multiplied, gives a force of twenty thousand seven hundred and odd men, and their multiplied dozens would produce nearly two hundred and forty-nine thousand : thus, at three removes from the focus of the system, a powerful force was at a moment's command, within whose several knots private friendship as well as the common cause was a source of union and fidelity. It was only in the higher grades of the confederation that private signals existed. In the inferior classes, each dozen only knew their own circle ; so that to whatever extent the system might be spread, each of the subordinate actors was intimate with no more than twelve persons, which tended at once to give greater personal security, and to prevent also a premature explosion of the conspiracy.

This brief sketch of the system is given, to account for Rory not knowing Regan to be a United man, although living in the same district. Regan belonged to another circle; and it was from very different desires that he was of the association, and with a very different set that he was leagued. Rory became a United Irishman from other and better motives than Regan. However erroneous those motives might have been, they had their origin in a generous nature; wild notions of the independence of his country were uppermost in the mind of Rory, while the mere love of licence was the incentive to Regan. During that terrible period of Ireland's history, some of the insurgents were pure, however mistaken enthusiasts; while there were others whose love of turbulence was their only motive. Of the latter class was Regan: he had inherited from his father a comfortable farm, but his love of debasing amusements—such as cock-fighting, &c., the frequency of his visits to public-houses, and his attachment to disorderly company, had led him from the wholesome pursuits that would have made him good and prosperous, to become improvident and embarrassed.

It is strange that whenever this takes place, a man mostly becomes an idler : the very fact which should warn him of his danger, and make him exert himself the more, generally operates in the contrary way. He gives himself up as it were to ruin, and seeks in dissipation forgetfulness of the past and disregard of the future. This state of things lasts as long as there is anything left to support him ; and when all is lost, he is then fit for every sort of violence or meanness ;—he must be either a beggar or a desperado.

It was in the middle stage that Regan fell in with De Welskein. They were just the men for each other :—Regan was the head of a disorderly set of fellows, who were ready and active agents in assisting the Frenchman in his smuggling ; and, in return, the brandy, and tobacco, and merry-makings of the smuggler were ample temptations and regards for Regan.

The debauched orgies of the cellar, where Rory now found himself for the first time, were familiar to the unfortunate victim of idleness, bad company and lawless desires.

Though he was often absent from home and neglected his husbandry, he still retained his farm; but his payments of rent became irregular, his farming stock grew less by degrees; a cow, a sheep, a pig, was obliged now and then to be sacrificed to supply his riotous propensities, and his poor mother and sister saw with sorrow their comforts lessening around them: but they complained not, for they dreaded the fierce temper of Shan Dhu, or Black John, as he was called. It was not only the diminution of his worldly substance they lamented, but they felt that the most respectable of their neighbours, one by one, dropped off from their acquaintance with them; and this, to the sensitive nature of the Irish peasant, cuts deeper than even want. Want, they are familiar with; they see it on every side, and they can bear it with patience: but the social virtues flourish amongst them in the midst of barrenness, like the palms in the desert.

Amongst the friendships which had decayed was that of the O'Mores. The widow loved her daughter too well to give her to a disorderly, though a comparatively wealthy peasant, as Shan Regan was when he asked Mary O'More for his wife ; and Mary herself had an intuitive dislike for all that was gross, which revolted from Regan's brutal nature. Rory, though he knew him not as a friend at any period,—for the men were too unlike each other ever to have associated closely,—yet always had recognised him as an old acquaintance whenever they met ; but he never sought his company—for Rory, though as full of fun, as fond of mirth, and loving his glass, his joke, and a pretty girl, as much as every Irishman ought to do, yet he reverenced the decencies of life too much to be a drunkard, a buffoon, or a debauchee. His acquaintanceship with Regan might have gone on, as far as Rory was concerned, just the same, quite uninfluenced by his sister's refusal ; but not so with the rejected one. He considered the part Mary had taken, as a family affront : his pride (such as it was) was wounded more than his heart ; or rather, it was his love for himself, and not for the girl, that suffered most. So he made a feud of the business, and included Rory amongst his foes. To this he was the more inclined, as he suspected Conolly, who was a sworn friend of O'More's, to be his rival.

From all these circumstances, it is no wonder that Rory was startled at seeing Regan at such a time : but as he could not help himself, he determined to affect composure, which he was the better able to accomplish, as he had time to recover from his surprise before his presence was manifest to Regan. The scene that had occurred in the morning, too, rendered him the more anxious to conciliate, and with asincere wish to overcome the coolness that Regan had lately observed towards him, he advanced to him with open hand and greeted him kindly. It was obvious, from the expression that passed over Regan's face, that the meeting was quite as startling and disagreeable to him as it had been to Rory, who continued still, however, the offer of his hand, and repeated his words of kindly recognition. A cold reply was all that followed, though the hand was accepted : but there was no sympathy in the contact ; the touch of friendship was wanting,—that touch whose sensation is so undefinable, but so well understood, —that natural freemasonry which springs from and is recognised by the heart.

As soon as the light was struck, a lamp was lighted in a ship-lantern that hung from the low roof of the cellar over a coarse table round which benches of a rude construction were placed. Another person as well as Regan was present in addition to the three Rory had followed from the public-house ; and this man seemed more familiar with De Welskein than any of the others, and sometimes addressed him in French. Round the cellar were some coils of rope ; a couple of hammocks were hung in one corner ; two or three kegs and some rolls of tobacco were stowed away under a truckle-bed in another quarter of the den ; and in a rude cupboard, coarse trenchers and drinking-cans were jumbled together, with some stone jars of a foreign aspect. After some bustle, pipes and tobacco were laid on the table, the stone bottles and the drinking-vessels were taken from the cupboard, and De Welskein invited Rory to sit down beside him.

“ Combe, you sair — seet down — here someting for you to dreenk — not nastee, like pobelick-house, bote goot — ha, ha ! No doretee portere, bote brandee — ver goot and nussing to pay.”

All the men sat down, and sending the stone jars from man to man, the cans were charged with brandy, slightly diluted with water from a black pitcher ; pipes were lighted, smoking and drinking commenced, and while a desultory conversation was kept up among the rest of the party, De Welskein questioned Rory as to the cause of his being the messenger to him. Rory made him acquainted with De Lacy’s illness, and the circumstances that led to his being his guest ; in all of which communication the person who spoke French assisted in making De Welskein and Rory intelligible to each other. This was no very easy matter sometimes ; the Frenchman's English bothering Rory uncommonly, as his name did also. However, as it was necessary he should drink to the founder of the feast, he was obliged to make an offer at his name, and so he boldly took his can of grog in his hand and with his best bow said —

“ Here's to your good health, Mr. Wilkinson.”

A laugh followed, at Rory's expense, in which the Frenchman only half joined, for it has already been noticed that his name was matter of anxiety to him ; so as soon as the laugh had subsided, he said —

“ No, no ! not dat my nem ;—De Welskein.”

“ I beg your pardon, sir — but would you say that agin, if you plaze ?”

The Frenchman now slowly and distinctly pronounced his name, giving the w the sound of the v, which it assumes in Dutch names, and repeated — “De - Vel - skeen.”

“ Thank you, sir,” says Rory,—“ I ax your pardon, and again I say, Here is to your good health, Mr. Devilskin.”

A roar of laughter followed this mistake of Rory’s, and all swore that that was the best name of all the others he enjoyed ; but the Frenchman did not like it, and said impatiently, using his own language, as a foreigner generally does when he becomes excited —

“ Non, non, non, mon ami !—Devilskeen !—non; c'est ‘Poil-de-diable ?—Sacré—quel nom !—‘Poil-de-diable !” you say not dat.—Pierre,” said he, addressing his friend who spoke French, faites-lui comprendre mon nom—pas De Welskein, parceque c'est trop difficile, mais St. Foix.” “ Ou, Sans-peur,” said Pierre.

The Frenchman nodded assent and said, “ Bon.” The compliment appeased him.

Pierre now told Rory to address De Welskein by the favourite name of Sans-peur ; but this was as difficult to Rory as the other, and the nearest approach he could make to it was "Scamper." This he varied sometimes into "Sampler," or "Sandpaper," as luck would have it.

While the drinking and smoking proceeded, De Welskein told Rory of the intended expedition from the Texel; and when he had given him all the verbal instruction he thought requisite, he entrusted him with the letter to De Lacy from General Hoche.

"Tare an' ouns!" said Rory; "is it the rale Gineral Hoche?" for Hoche's name and reputation were well known in Ireland.

"Oui," said De Welskein.

"What do you mane by we?—" "It's not uz at all I'm axin' about; but I want to know, is this letther from the rale Gineral?"

"Certanlee!—oui."

"Augh! what is he sayin' we for?" said Rory, turning to Pierre, who was grinning at Rory's mistakes and the Frenchman's impatience.

"He means, yes," said Pierre: "oui means yes."

"Oh ! I ax your pardon, Mr. Sandpaper ;—then this is the rale Gineral's letther !—Oh ! to think that I'd ever see the proud day that I'd have a letther of Gineral Hoche's in my fist !" and he kissed it with rapture.

The Frenchman cried "Sacré !" and laughed at his enthusiasm ; and Rory proceeded—

"And will we see the Gineral here, Mr. Scraper ?"

"Me afraid no !" said De Welskein ; and he shook his head mysteriously and made a grimace.

"What do you mane ?" said Rory.

"Me afraid he die."

"Is it Gineral Hoche die !—arrahh, an' what would he die for ?"

"Me tsinks he get vaut you call gunstump."

"Gun—what ?"

"He as got de gunstump in him."

"God keep us !" says Rory,—"think o' that ! And where is it in him, sir ?"

"Inside, into his boddee."

"Oh ! murdher, my poor fellow ! to have the stump of a gun stickin' in him !"

'No, no, de gun not stick in him—you mis-tek : it is vaut I vood say, dat he has de tickle-hine."

"What is it he says about ticklin'?" said Rory to Pierre, who only grinned and enjoyed the mutual mistakes of the Frenchman and the Paddy.

"Mal à la poitrine," said De Welskein.

"That's thtrue, 'faith," said Rory. "If he's so bad as that, his only dipindince is in the Padhereens, sure enough."

Peter (or Pierre) now laughed outright at Rory's blunder, which must be explained. Padhereens is the name the Irish give to their beads, upon which they count the number of Paters (or Pathers) they repeat, and hence the name Padhereens; and Rory very naturally came to the conclusion, that if a man was at the point of death, which Rory conceived to be most likely when he had the 'stump of a gun stickin' in him', the best thing he could do would be to say his prayers.

De Welskein saw there was a mystification going forward ; so he said to Pierre, "Expliquez donc !"

"What he says is," said Pierre, "that the General has a consumption."

"Ah! I forgess de terminaison;—gunstump-sion,—yais, dat is raight!—gunstumpsion."

"Oh, murdher!" said Rory: "if we had him here, we would cure him intirely."

"Comment?" said the Frenchman.

"Oh, it's common enough in this counthry, indeed," said Rory. "The finest thing in the world for consumption is goat's milk, made into whay."

"Ah, yais,—ghost's milk ver goot."

"Goat's milk, I say," says Rory.

"Yais, yais, I oonderstan'," said the Frenchman with great complacency: "Ghost's milk."

"Faith it's ghost's milk he'll be takin', I'm afeard, sure enough," said Pierre, laughing at De Welskein's mistake.

"Oh, murdher!" said Rory, "and is Ginal Hoche goin' to die? Oh, thin that is the murdher!" *

So, Rory, in the idiom of his language, unintentionally expressed what was in fact the fate of the gallant Hoche.

* This expression means "that is the pity."

A tap at the door of the cellar announced a fresh arrival ; and after some signals given, the door was opened and some other men entered, and, at short intervals after, a few girls. Some of the latter were good-looking, though with a certain expression of boldness and recklessness that Rory did not admire. Rory had enough of imagination and sentiment to render the society of the softer sex always matter of delight to him ; but there was something in the manner of these girls he did not like.

“ You see,” said De Welskein, “ de leddees mek visite to me.”

“ Yis, sir,” said Rory, who did not know how, very well, to answer this appeal.

“ But you no dreenk.”

“ Thank you, sir, I’m doin’ very well.”

“ You no like brandee ?”

“ Faith, it’s iligant stuff it is ! But you know, Mr. Sandpaper, that enough is as good as a faist.”

"If you no like brandee, give you wine."

Rory refused the offer ; but one of the girls addressed De Welskein, and thanking him for his offer, said, "if he'd make a big jug o' the nice thing he gave them the other night?"

Pierre explained to him that some of the ladies would like negus, because they thought it genteel.

"Ah !" said the Frenchman, "yais, my dear, certainement, you moste have your leetle niggers: vouds you like to have some nutmarks een it ?"

"What do you say, Mr. Whelpskin ?" said the girl, simpering.

"Vouds you like nutmarks ?"

Pierre came to the rescue. "He says, would you like to have your jug o' negus made with nutmegs ? my darling."

"Any way Mr. Whelpskin plazes."

"So it's not too wake," says another.

"A dash o' sper'ts through it will make it livelier, sir," said the most audacious of the party. And accordingly a large jug of niggers, with nutmarks and the dash o' sper'ts, was made. A fiddler, in some time, made his appearance; and after the first jug of niggers had been demolished, a dance was set on foot. One of the ladies asked Rory to "stand up on the flure," which, of course, Rory did, and exerted himself to the utmost to do credit to his dancing-master. In short, Rory, though he did not like the party, had intuitively too much savoir vivre to let any repugnance he might entertain be manifested. He drank, to be sure, sparingly; and after the niggers was introduced, he took no more brandy-and-water: he smoked an occasional pipe, and danced "like anything," but he kept himself clear of intoxication, though he had drunk enough to produce exhilaration. Dance after dance succeeded; and Rory displayed so much elasticity of limb, that it excited the admiration even of De Welskein. One of Rory's partners seemed much taken with him; and after a certain jig they had executed, much to their mutual honour and the admiration of the beholders, the fair danseuse sat beside him so close, as not to admit of any doubt that she rather admired him. A cessation to the dancing now took place, and brandy-and-water and niggers ad infinitum was the order of the day —or rather the night. A song was next called for from the girl who sat beside Rory; and after a proper quantity of hemming and hawing, and protestations that she was very hoarse, she sang with a good voice, whose natural sweetness seemed to have been rendered coarse by exposure to weather, the following song :

Oh ! if all the young maidens was blackbirds and thrishes,
Oh ! if all the young maidens was blackbirds and thrishes,
Oh ! if all the young maidens was blackbirds and thrishes,
It's then the young men would be batin' the bushes.

Oh ! if all the young maidens was ducks in the wather,
Oh ! if all the young maidens was ducks in the wather,
Oh ! if all the young maidens was ducks in the wather,
It's then the young men would jump in and swim afther.

Oh ! if all the young maidens was birds on a mountain,
Oh ! if all the young maidens was birds on a mountain,
Oh ! if all the young maidens was birds on a mountain,
It's then the young men would get guns and go grousin'.

If the maidens was all throuth and salmon so lively,
If the maidens was all throuth and salmon so lively,
If the maidens was all throuth and salmon so lively,
Oh ! the divil a one would ate mate on a Friday.

Loud applause followed this charming lyric, during the singing of which the damsel cast sundry sly glances at Rory, who could not mistake that she was making love to him. Rory was a handsome fellow, and was as conscious as most handsome fellows are, that there is a certain readiness on the part of the softer sex to be affected by good looks — but this rather open manifestation of it embarrassed him. To repel a woman was what his nature would not permit him to do ; yet to yield to the species of temptation that was offered to him was what his heart forbade.

The revel had proceeded now for some hours, and great licence was exhibited on the part of all. Rory's partner still clung to him with a degree of seductiveness that might have influenced him at another time ; but now the unholy spell was powerless. He had that morning won the plighted troth of his Kathleen, and the bare thought of being faithless to her was profanation. He thought of her sweet song, even in defiance of the scraping of the tipsy fiddler who still stimulated the drunken party to stagger through the dance ; and above the reeking steams of punch and tobacco rose the sweet odour of the breath of the cows and the morning flowers to his memory : the recollection was his salvation.

Oh, what of earthly influence can so fortify the heart of man against the seductions of vice as the love of a virtuous woman !

Let us pursue this scene no further : suffice it to say, their brutal revelry had so far overcome the party, that of all present, Rory O'More and his partner only were thoroughly conscious of what was going forward. When Rory saw there was none to oppose his retiring, he drew the bolt of the door to depart : his tempting partner made a last appeal to induce him to stay, and even threw her arms round his neck and kissed him.

Rory's manhood rebelled for a moment ; but the thought of Kathleen came over him, and in as soothing a tone as he could command, he said — “ Don't blame me ; I 've a sweetheart that trusts to me, and I mustn't deceive the innocent girl ! ”

The words “ innocent girl ” seemed to go through the heart of the woman like a pistol-shot. She withdrew her arms from Rory's neck, and hiding her flushed face in her hands, burst into tears, and, throwing herself on a bench, sobbed as though her heart would break.

Rory looked on her with pity ; but, fearing to trust himself to so softening an influence as a woman's weeping, he rushed up the broken steps of the cellar, and ran down the narrow alley until he had turned its corner. He then paused a moment, to endeavour to remember the way he had come, which had been so intricate, that under the exciting circumstances in which he had been led to the place and was leaving it, it cannot be wondered his recollection was rather misty ; so, taking the turn which chance suggested when he ran from the alley, he threaded some lonely lanes, treading as stealthily as his haste would permit ; —for an occasional gleam of light through a cracked shutter or the chink of a door betokened that some of the inhabitants of this ill-conditioned quarter were still watchers ; and from the specimen he had seen of the company it afforded, he had no wish to encounter any more of its inmates. The sensation of a freer atmosphere than that of the confined closes he had been traversing now came upon him, and indicated the vicinity of a more open space ; and facing the current of air that streamed up the lane, he soon arrived in what appeared to him to be the high street of the town. Here all was empty, dark, and silent, except for the splashing of the rain from the spouts of the houses, and Rory was obliged again to pause, for he knew not which way to turn, as he had made his way from the alley by a route different from that by which he entered, and he was consequently in a street he had never seen before, in a town to which he was a stranger.

He stood for some minutes, unmindful of the torrent of rain that was falling, quite absorbed in the consideration of what he should do. It was late, and he doubted whether at such an hour he would be likely to get admittance to a place of abode for the night: besides, he did not know where to find it; and it struck him that the only course left him was to make the best of his way out of the town, and proceed homewards. This, to be sure, was a heavy task to impose on himself, for he had not taken any rest since he left his own house; he had traversed a considerable tract of country, and to go over the same ground again without the intervention of sleep was what even so active a fellow as Rory O'More did not relish the contemplation of. Therefore the decision he came to at last was, to leave the matter to chance; — if in his passage through the town he saw any place that promised him shelter, to ask for it; and if not, to start direct for home.

His resolve being taken, he wrapped his frieze-coat about him—for he now noticed that it did rain rather heavily—and walked at a smart pace up the length of street that lay before him. He had not proceeded far when the fall of many footsteps attracted his attention; and from the heavy and measured tread, it was plain that a party of soldiers was in his neighbourhood. He stopped and held his breath: the party was evidently getting nearer; he had no right to be abroad at that hour, for the curfew law had been revived of late. He thought of the letter he had in his possession, and death to himself, and discovery of the plot flashed upon his imagination. To tear the letter suggested itself to him; but then, it might contain intelligence of importance: to preserve it therefore was desirable; yet to have it found, destruction. What was to be done?

Listening intensely to ascertain the quarter

whence the footsteps approached, he was soon sensible that the party advanced from the point towards which he was moving: therefore, trusting to the darkness of the night and the lightness of his heels, Rory turned about, and with that peculiar agility of step so characteristic of his countrymen, he ran lightly down the street. As he advanced towards the end of it, he perceived there was a wider space beyond it; and knowing the shade of the houses favoured his escape, and still hearing the footsteps following him, he dreaded that the moment he should emerge from the street into the open space, he should be seen. While this thought occurred to him, he perceived, a few steps in advance of him, a large old-fashioned projecting porch, whose clumsy columns and deep recess suggested at once the idea of concealment: so, turning sharply up two or three steps, he became ensconced in the door-way, drawing himself up closely behind one of the columns.

As the footsteps advanced, Rory could hear the rattling of fire-arms mingling with the heavy tramp of the men. His anxiety was at its height when he saw the party just before the door : “Another instant,” thought he, “and the danger’s past !” when, to his consternation, the sudden exclamation of “Halt !” brought the file of men to a dead stand-still within a few feet of his place of concealment. He now thought it was all over with him : he expected to be dragged from his hiding-place every instant, brought before the military authorities, and the letter he bore about him being inevitably found, hanged at the drum-head for a rebel. He heard some mysterious mutterings of the corporal, and immediately after, the clattering of a couple of bayonets,—he fancied them already in his body. But still he remained unmolested, though the file of men yet stood before him ;—Rory scarcely dared to respire.

It happened that this house within whose porch he had taken refuge was inhabited by the colonel of the regiment then quartered in the town. It stood at the corner of an open and irregular space, called “the Green,” where some houses were scattered round a piece of dirty grass, and geese and pigs used to promenade during the day, and the belles of the town in the evening, to hear the band play, and let the officers stare them out of countenance. The barrack lay at the upper end of the street ; but the quarters were so indifferent, that the colonel preferred taking up his residence in this house, which was removed from the barrack, it is true ; but, to increase his security, which the suspicious nature of the times rendered it necessary, in his opinion, to look after, he had two sentinels stationed there, conduced not only to his safety, but to his consequence, of which the colonel was not a little vain. The narrowness of the foot-way before the house would have rendered sentry-boxes inconvenient in front,—therefore they were placed round the corner ; and it was while the corporal was employed in relieving the guard at the flank of the house, that the file of soldiers remained before the porch.

St. Clement's Church

This was for some minutes — for everybody knows that such matters must be conducted with that system and solemnity so necessary to the good of the service.

To relieve the guard, the corporal marches up one of his men to face the sentinel on duty. These two make a rattle with their firelocks and hold them in a transverse position, which looks pretty ; then they advance to each other with two long strides, and stick their faces close together, to the manifest danger of flattening their noses, the corporal standing by all the time, as if to see that they should not bite each other : another slap on their firelocks to rattle them ; then the new-comer goes over to the sentry-box, and the other takes his place : then the corporal utters some mysterious grumblings—such as, “Haw!” “Who!” the men throw their transverse muskets upon their arms, as if they were going to nurse them : another grunt from the corporal — the relieved sentinel joins the main body, the corporal puts himself at their head, gives another mysterious growl, and tramp, tramp, they go, again to perform the same interesting and intellectual ceremony at another sentry-box, until, having finished his rounds, the corporal marches back into the guard-house twelve wet men, in lieu of twelve dry ones that he took out.

While all this “pomp and circumstance of glorious war” was going forward, Rory was in agony. No image is sufficient to express the state of excitement his impatient nature underwent during the interval, which he thought an age: a bee in a bottle, a schoolboy in his master’s apple-tree, or a hen on a hot griddle, are but faint figures of speech for the purpose. Well was it for Rory that the rain continued to fall so copiously!—the soldiers buried their faces deeply inside the collars of their coats, and cast not a glance towards the porch: Thus, the very inclemency of the night was propitious to the refugee, who was startled once more, however, for a moment, by the return of the corporal, which caused a movement amongst the men. “They see me now,” thought Rory to himself, and his heart sunk when he heard the words “Fall in.”

“Oh, murdher!” thought Rory: “if they come in, I’m lost.”

They did not “come in,” however, and after another growl from the corporal, which was unintelligible, the blessed sound of “March!” fell on Rory’s ear with something of the same sensation that the announcement of a reprieve produces on a prisoner in the condemned cell; and he saw the file execute a “right-about-face,” and go the way whence they came. Every successive tramp that increased the distance between Rory and the soldiers took a ton weight off his heart, and as the receding footsteps of the men faded into distance he breathed freely again.

As soon as the silence was perfectly restored, Rory thought of emerging from his place of retreat. Had he been a person conversant with the relieving of guards, he would have guessed that some such matter must have been the cause of the scene just recorded; but living a rural life, as he did, such martial mysteries were unknown to him, and while he congratulated himself on being free from danger and contemplated a retreat, he little dreamt that at the flank of the house under whose porch he stood, a pair of sentinels were on guard. So, when there was no sound to indicate that any one save himself was on the watch, (for, it being still raining, the sentries on the flank kept most religiously bound within their sentry-boxes—and small blame to them!) Rory thought he had better be off, and ventured to withdraw his body from the small space between the column and the wall into which he had miraculously jammed himself: but in the doing of this, he was obliged, as it were, to jerk himself out, and by some unlucky chance, either in getting himself in or out, the cape of his coat caught in a bell-pull, and in the effort to free himself, he felt that he was laid hold of by the shoulder, and heard at the same instant of time the sound of a bell. Those who have felt what it is to be in nervous situations will not wonder that Rory's heart jumped as he felt himself caught, and heard at the same moment a sound whose very purpose is to awake attention. And it was such a bell ;—none of your trifling tinklers, none of your little whipper-snapper sort of bells ; not like the bark of a Blenheim, but the bay of a watch-dog ; not like a muffin-merchant's, but a dustman's ; not merely made to call Molly up stairs,—but one of your deep-mouthing devils, doomed to destroy the repose of half a street ;—in short,

————— “a dreadful bell,
To fright the isle from its propriety.”

Rory stood aghast ! Had the metal that composed this “infernal machine” been molten and cast down his throat, it could not have astonished him more : besides, it seemed as if it would never have done ringing. We hear great complaints in our days of bell-hangers ; but those of old, to judge from the case in question, must have been prime hands,—for on it went, ding, ding, ding, as if it really had a pleasure in ringing. Whether it was the specific gravity of the monster that produced so much vivacity in the spring on which it was suspended, or the superior skill of former bell-hangers, may remain a matter of dispute to the curious; but the fact that resulted (and facts are all we have to do with) is, that ere the bell had ceased its villainous vibrations, Rory heard a window raised above his head, and the demand of "Who's there?" in no very gracious voice.

Rory kept profoundly quiet.

"Who's there?" was again snarled out.

Rory looked up from the shelter of the porch and saw a head and a nightcap protruded from the window: he was as quiet as a mouse.

"Sentry!" was the next word Rory heard, given in a most authoritative tone.

A gust of wind and a dash of rain whirled round the corner, which must have convinced the colonel (for it was he who was calling from the window) that his voice could not have reached the sentinels in the teeth of the blast which blew his nightcap off his head and dashed it into Rory's face.

Rory was nearly knocked down,—for the smallest thing upsets us when we are alarmed.

“Sentry!” was shouted louder than before;

The soldiers answered the summons. The colonel asked who rang the bell:—the sentries did not know.

“You have been asleep!” said the colonel.

“No, your honour,” said the sentry, “we couldn’t; the guard has been but just relieved!”

“Have you seen no one passing?”

“No, your honour,—no one passed at this side; and we marched down the other street not five minutes ago, and not a living soul was in it.”

“Then what could have rung the bell?”

“Twas only a mistake, sir,” said Rory, whose excitement had been wound to such intensity, that his eagerness to satisfy the question overlooked the consequence to his personal safety in the sound of his voice being heard; but the instant he had spoken, he said to himself, “ The d—l cut the tongue out of you, Rory !”

Fortunately the gusts of wind and splashing of rain rendered all sounds, and the points whence they came, uncertain. Nevertheless, the colonel looked towards the porch; but seeing no one, he said to the sentry, “ What’s that you say about a mistake ?”

“ No, your honour, I don’t mistake,” said the sentry, who was equally uncertain with the colonel if any third person had spoken, and fancied he had been charged with making a mistake.

“ Didn’t you say something of a mistake ?” asked the colonel in one of the pauses of the storm.

“ No, your honour,” said the sentry.

Just at this moment, when Rory was thinking if he hadn’t better make a run for it at once, he heard the bolt of the door behind him gently drawn, and the instant after, a pluck at his coat, and a whispered “ Come in,” made him turn round. He saw the door stand ajar, and a hand beckon him forward, at the same moment that the voice of the colonel from the window said, "See if there's any one hiding in the porch."

Rory slipped inside the hall-door, which was softly closed as the sentry walked up the steps.

"There's no one here, your honour," said the sentry.

"Push the door," said the colonel.

The sentry did so; but the door had been fastened on the inside.

CHAPTER XI.

SHOWING THAT ONE HALF OF THE WORLD DOES NOT KNOW HOW THE OTHER HALF LIVES; AND ALSO, THAT SOFT WORDS CAN BEND HARD IRON, THOUGH THEY DO NOT BUTTER PARSNIPS.

VERY much about the time that Rory O'More rushed from the cellar and endeavoured to make his way out of the town, there was an old tinker, driving an ass before him, making his way into it. From the rudely-constructed straddle of the sorry animal, three or four rusty old kettles, and a budget containing the implements of the tinker's trade, depended; but the straddle was worth more than it looked good for,—for the tinker had so contrived the pannels of the lumbering affair, that a convenient space was left within for stowing away tobacco, which he bought from Monsieur De Welskein, and sold at a handsome profit to the peasantry during his wanderings among them — for they could get none so good or so cheap through the legitimate channel: besides, they were glad to give a helping hand to the old tinker, whose poverty and shrewdness commanded at once their pity and their fear.

It may seem strange to class these two feelings together—but they often exist. They say “Pity is akin to love;”—but it is equally true that “Love is related to fear;”—and thus, perhaps, a sort of collateral relationship may be established between them.

I should not have made any observation on this, but that I do not remember seeing it remarked elsewhere; and when one advances anything new, it is common even to oneself to be startled at it, and a desire is at once engendered to make it manifest that one has not committed an absurdity.

Now, I remember well, when a child, that I was often horrified by the presence of a certain old and disgusting beggarman; yet I constantly gave him alms. There was something in that old man I dreaded; and yet I remember, even to this day, I pitied him. To be sure, the virtue of charity had been early instilled into my mind by one who now, I trust, in Heaven enjoys the reward of her goodness; and so gracious and winning is the habit of doing charity's holy offices, that even to the innocent child, on whom neither want nor reason can have impressed the value of the virtue he is taught, there is something pleasant in the timorous dropping of a half-penny from its pure and dimpled fingers into the soiled and withered palm of age: as if Heaven had preordained that no weakness or antipathy of our nature should interfere with the sacred duty;—a duty so sacred, that even our Lord himself made its beauty the theme of a parable, and reproved the intolerant Jew with the mild precept of “ Go thou and do likewise.”

Solomon, for that was the tinker's name, was pitied and feared ; for he seemed to be poor, and was known to be penetrating. He had a prying temper and a tenacious memory. The former led him to a knowledge of the circumstances of most of the people of all classes in the country where he made his rounds, and the latter treasured up the information. Thus the past and present were alike familiar to him ; and from these, his natural acuteness was often enabled to presage the future.

Such a power, in the uncalculating community amongst whom he moved, gave him a reputation little short of witchcraft. He was called “a mighty knowledgable man,”— and “knowledge is power;” and where did human power ever exist, that its influence has not been dreaded and its possession abused ? This was fully exemplified in the case of the old tinker,— he was feared, not loved, by the peasantry ; and yet, though no one liked him, there was, from a dread of offending, all the demonstrations of civility shown him that love would have procured. The tinker was quite aware of the position he held, and of its cause; and his bitterness (for he was bitter) enjoyed the triumph of forcing these pretended testimonies of affection, and he laughed at this perjury of the heart. "Hypocrisy is the homage that vice pays to virtue." How often is a smile the tribute that fear pays to power!

Nevertheless, with this dread—it may almost be said, dislike—that he inspired, he was pitied, from his apparent wretched and desolate condition. Home he had none, nor living thing with whom he held continued companionship, except the poor ass he drove, whose food was a nibble from the road-side, unless when it was bestowed by the same friendly hand that gave food to his master—for Solomon never paid for anything except what he traded on. The love of money ruled him with a power stronger than that by which he ruled his fellow-men; and though he possessed the superior acuteness that governed intelligent creatures, he was himself the senseless slave of an inanimate metal. He was a miser,—a miser in the fullest sense of the word; not loving money for the sake of what money can procure, but loving it for its own sake—worshipping the mere thing: to him a guinea was a god. To such a wretch, to starve was easier than to pay; therefore he never tasted food except it was given to him: and even on these terms he seldom wanted, for he laid the country under contribution from the kitchen of the squire to the peasant's pot of potatoes. With all this, he was stealthy and roguish as a fox, tortuous and treacherous as a snake,—secret, cold, and greedy as the grave.

Yet, with the characteristic touch of fun that pervades everything Irish, this hateful old miscreant had a comical name bestowed on him;—he was called “Sawdhering Solomon,” from his profession of tinker: and this was the name he commonly went by, though sometimes it was changed for “Solomon Sly.” Neither of these names was meant, of course, to reach his ears; but he was made cognisant of them by means of the little boys, who hated him openly, and who shouted the name after him when they were quite sure of being out of the reach of the old tinker's crooked stick : and sometimes the urchins ventured so far even as to throw stones or clods at him, when they had the ambuscade of a hedge and the intervention of a ditch to screen and protect them. On these occasions, Solomon might get a whack on the back from a stone, or have a dry clod judiciously lobbed under his ear, powdering his wig with all the breaking particles of earth that did not run down between his clothes and his back. Then would he turn round to strike with his stick ; but the retiring laugh and footsteps of children at the other side of the hedge were all that were manifest to Solomon : and then would the old vagabond grin and shake his stick with the expression of a fiend, and utter horrible curses on the thoughtless urchins. And though the provocation was unjustifiable, it is true, yet there is something abhorrent in the idea of age cursing childhood, particularly as the vindictive old tinker used to curse.

It was about the time that Rory O'More was leaving the cellar, that Solomon, I say, was making his way into the town, at whose outskirts he made a detour from the high road and drove his ass up a little lane, at the end of which there was a small haggart,* whose fence was only a low wall of loose stones and some furze-bushes. Solomon very coolly abstracted some stones, pulled away some of the furze, and made a way for his ass to enter the haggart, where, placing him between two small stacks of hay, he procured shelter and provender for the poor brute. He then lifted the straddle and his old kettles from the ass's back, and withdrew from the premises, carrying his goods to some distance, where, under a hedge, he let them lie; and marking the spot well, he proceeded alone to the town, and made for the cellar of the smuggler.

It was only in his capacity of smuggler that De Welskein held any communication with the tinker. Solomon, though he guessed that an extensive conspiracy was on foot, yet, wise as he was, he did not know any individual engaged in it, for none would trust him to belong to the Union, and those engaged in it kept the secret inviolate,—singularly so indeed, for in all the thousands who had sworn, there was but one found to betray, and he entered the confederation for the very purpose.

* Hay-yard.

When the unfortunate girl whom Rory had left sobbing in the cellar had recovered her out-break of grief, she arose from the bench on which she had flung herself in her passion of tears, and the feeling that had possessed her heart changed from lawless love to bitter hate—for and cursing the man that had made her feel such degradation, she quitted the den of riot and iniquity, leaving the beastly revellers sunk in besotted slumber. When Solomon, therefore, reached the cellar and tapped stealthily at the door, he received no answer. On knocking again more loudly, the door yielded to his touch, and pushing it gently open, he looked cautiously into the cellar. He saw a dim lamp, overturned drinking-vessels, and prostrate figures, and heard the heavy snoring of drunken sleep. He advanced noiselessly, and looked carefully about ; and when he found that deep and real slumber reigned around him, he cast about his searching eyes, and his heart (if he had such a thing) was gladdened at the thought of being a gainer by the universal swinishness in which his friends were buried. He stole softly over to the truckle-bed under which the tobacco was hid, and going on all-fours, he looked to see if there was a roll of it within easy reach — for the legs of one of the sleepers hung over the side and made a sort of barrier.

“ Hell has no fury like a woman scorn'd.”

He crawled nearer, and, with the aid of his crooked stick, abstracted a parcel of the precious weed from its place of concealment ; and then, with the stealthiness of a cat, he stole back to the door, which he closed gently after him and retreated with his booty.

Now, it was to buy tobacco that the tinker had made his visit to De Welskein ; and he chuckled at the thought of getting the merchandise without the transfer of coin, and hugged the roll of tobacco to his heart with the passion of a lover. To re-cram the pannel of his ass's straddle, and depart after his exploit, was Solomon's first intention as he sneaked back towards the haggart where his ass was committing robbery also ; but another idea arose, and he slackened his pace while he conned it over, and on second thoughts he considered it more advisable to make his visit to De Welskein, as it was about the period that worthy knew he had intended calling, and if the abstracted tobacco should be missed, his unusual absence might direct suspicion against him, as it was some time since Solomon had made a purchase, and De Welskein knew that tobacco was what Solomon could not do without. Therefore, instead of going back to the haggart, he went to a neighbouring lane where he knew the forge of a blacksmith stood, and poking and scraping out with his stick and hands a hole out of a heap of cinders and ashes that stood near the door, he concealed the treasure beneath it and returned to the cellar. He knocked again, lest any of its inmates might have awoke in the interval ; and finding all as silent as before, he entered, and approaching De Welskein, he shook him by the shoulder till he roused him, and said,

“ One ud think you had nothing to be afeard iv, when you sleep with the door open.”

De Welskein rubbed his eyes, stared up at Solomon, uttered a great many “ Sacrés,” and “ Diables,” and proceeded to awake the rest of the party and demand the cause of the door being open. They were all bewildered, being still half-drunk ; but after much blustering and swearing, Rory O'More at last was missed, and also the girl with whom he had been dancing. This was conclusive evidence of how the circumstance had occurred, and De Welskein's rage and abuse of Rory were furious. Regan, too, threw in his word of censure ; and, amongst them all, poor Rory had more foul words applied to him than he ever had before in the same space of time.

"Who is that you're blessin', all o' yiz?" said Solomon

"That scatthered-brained swaggerer Rory O'More," said Regan.

"Rory O'More!" said Solomon, who knew Rory's habits were not likely to lead him into the disorderly set;—"why, what brought him here?" and he looked sharply at De Welskein, as much as to say, "There's a mystery."

"Why, sare? if you go for dat moche, what for you come here? — ha!"

"Oh, you know yourself, munseer," said Solomon, "what brings me here; but"—

"Well, sare," said De Welskein interrupting him, "and me know whas bring de osser gentlemen too: das nuff for me — nussing to you."

"Oh, don't be onaisy," said Solomon coolly—"I don't want to smoke your saycrets."

"No, G— d—n! you old rog! you not smok me, you razzer smok my tabac."

Solomon looked towards the Frenchman, to see if there was any meaning in his eye when he spoke of his tobacco; but he saw his secret was safe. The Frenchman proceeded—

“ Dere ! you seet down you — old rog — vieux chaudronnier de campagne — seet down, smoke your tabac and dreenk, and never mind nussing else !”

Solomon did as he was desired ; he took a pipe and mixed a stiff glass of brandy-and-water, after tossing off a couple of glasses pure, to warm his heart, as he said himself, “ afther the cruel wettin’ he got.”

“ Warm his heart indeed !” said one of the men aside : “ 'faith, all the sper’ts in Ireland, and all the turf in the Bog of Allen, wouldn’t warm it.”

De Welskein took Regan aside, and expressed great displeasure against Rory for leaving him without saying where De Lacy was to be found ; but Regan set him at rest on that subject by telling him he knew Rory’s place of abode, and would conduct him to it if he liked. This consoled the Frenchman, and he again lay down to sleep, requesting more care might be taken about the door. Solomon continued to smoke and drink until the approach of dawn, when the man called Pierre let him out of the cellar, and he went back to the haggart, having made the best bargain he could for some tobacco, and getting his pocket-pistol, as he called a tolerably capacious tin flask, filled with brandy as a bonus for his "taking sitch a power o' tabakky from them," as he said himself; and the equivoke gave poignancy to the pleasure of his theft.

When he got back to the haggart, he abstracted his ass from the haystack, which the ass seemed loath to quit, and before retiring, the little beast made a last desperate plunge into the hay, and dragged away so large a mouthful, that it trailed after him all the way from the stack to the gap where Solomon now led him out, and the poor innocent haystack looked very much in the condition of a hot loaf out of which Master Tommy has had his wicked will.

Solomon replaced the stones and the furzebush, and led off his ass to the hedge where the straddle was secreted ; there he stuffed it with the purchased tobacco, (the stolen roll still lay where the tinker had concealed it,) and mounting his wallet and his kettles on the back of the ass, he drove him away from the field as soon as sunrise permitted him lawfully to appear on the road.

What did he do then ?

He had the impudence to march up the lane that led to the haggart, driving his ass before him and crying loudly, “ Pots, pans, and kittles to mind.” The ass turned a longing look towards the haggart, and a whack from Solomon’s stick was required to remind him that tinkers’ asses must not eat hay by daylight. Solomon now approached the dwelling to which the plundered haggart was attached, and found the family awake and doing : the man went out to work, and the woman, in answer to Solomon’s request to know “ if there was any pots, pans, and kittles to mind,” produced a certain tin saucepan, with a demand to know “ what would

"he take to repair it? not that it wanted it much," she said, "only, divil take it! it put out the fire always when it was put on, but didn't lake a grate dale at all."

"Why, tare an' ouns, woman," cried Solomon, holding up the vessel between him and the sky, "there's a hole in it you could dhrive a coach thro'."

"Arrah, be aisý!" says the woman.

"Look at it yourself," says Solomon, letting the saucepan down.

A little child now popped his finger through the hole, and waggling it backwards and forwards, said, "Look, mammy!" and grinned as if he had done a very clever thing.

The mother gave him a box on the ear, calling him "a divil" at the same time, and sent him yelping away.

"Faith, that's a 'cute child!" said Solomon, grinning a horrid smile; "he'd make an iligant tinker, he sees a hole in a pot so well."

"The meddlin' cur!" said the mother. "Well, what'll you put a bit o' sawdher an it for?"

"A bit o' sawdher indeed!" said Solomon.
"Oh, 'faith, it's a piece o' tin I must insart into it."

"Devil an insart," says the woman, "you'll insart my saucepan, my good man! Sawdher is all it wants—jist a weeshee taste o' sawdher."

"Cock you up with my sawdher indeed!"
said Solomon: "why, 'twould take more than all the sawdher I have to stop it. Sure, sawdher is as dear as tin; and rawzin's riz."

"Arrah, why would rawzin be riz?"

"There was sitch a power o' fiddlers to be at the fair next week, that they bought all the rawzin up."

"Ah, go 'long wid you!"

"It's thruth I'm tellin' you."

"Well, what will you take for the saucepan?"

"I'll mind it for fourpince."

"Fourpince! Oh, where do you expec' to go when you die? Fourpince indeed! I'll give you tupp'ns."

"Couldn't," says Solomon, shaking his head and going to drive away the ass.

"Well, what will you say?" said the woman.

"Well, see now," said Solomon, "I'm tired with thravelling a'most all night, and I'm wantin' rest; and indeed I'd be glad to sit down, if it was only to rest, let alone doin' a job and airnin' a thrifle; and indeed I want it bad, for the times is hard; and, so God bless you, if you'll jist throw in a thrifle o' brequest into the bargain, and gi' me tupp'ns ha'pny, I'll make the saucepan as good as new."

"Well, I wouldn't be hard wid you, my poor man, and so you may do it."

So down sat the tinker and opened his budget; and his iron was heated and his 'sawdher' produced, not forgetting the 'rawzin' that was 'riz; and bits of old tin were produced from his budget, into which the children looked with the most profound curiosity, endeavouring to fathom the depth of its mysterious treasures. Other bits of tin dazzled their longing eyes, and a great shears seemed placed there to guard the invaluable store from plunder. Solomon cut and rasped and hammered away, and rubbing his hot soldering-iron upon his powdered rosin and solder, he raised so great a smoke and so bad a smell, that the children looked on him as some wonderful conjuror; and as they saw the bright streaks that his implement produced wherever it was rubbed, their delight was profound.

When the man of the house returned to breakfast, he saw Solomon seated at the door mending the leaky vessel, and his children standing round him in wonder, and as soon as the job was done, Solomon was called in to breakfast.

“What do you think!” said the husband to the wife.

“What?” said she.

“That blackguard calf got over the wall o’ the haggart again last night and made a holy show o’ the hay-stack.”

“Oh, you don’t tell me so!” said the wife.

“Luck to the lie in it!” said the husband.

Solomon kept eating his breakfast with the most profound indifference until the husband and wife had exhausted their eloquence, and then he said,

The Tinker

“ Them cawves is great rogues.”

“ The devil run a-huntin’ with him for a calf !

Oh, wait ‘till the next time I ketch him !”

“ Poor thing, poor thing !” said Solomon, tenderly. “ Sure, it’s nath’ral they’d ate !”

“ ’Faith, he may be contint with his good grass, I think,” said the man.

“ Thru for you — thru for you,” said Solomon quietly : “ but it’s remarkable how bowld some o’ them cawves is.”

Breakfast was finished — the job paid for — the wallet replaced on the ass amid the observation and regret of all the children, who watched the old tinker and saw him depart with sorrow as he drove his ass down the lane, after getting a job and begging a breakfast from the man he had robbed over-night.

Solomon now proceeded to the town, and went to the forge beside which he had deposited the tobacco. Here he had a plausible pretext to go, for the shoes of the ass wanted to be looked to. On his arrival at the forge, the smith was unoccupied, so there was more time to spare for Solomon to make as hard a bargain as he could for the execution of the job.

" Maybe you could let me make an exchange wid you ? and if you would have anything in the tinkerin' line to do, sure I'd do it for nothin' for you, if you'd do the ass for nothin'."

" Not a pot, nor pan, nor kettle have I," said the blacksmith ; " I'm a bachelor, and intind to stay so."

In the mean time he began to examine the ass's shoes ; and the tobacco with which the straddle was lined being so near his nose, the smith began to snuff, and said at last, " Where the dickins is the tabakky ?"

Solomon, who caught the sound of the first sniff the smith had given, saw directly how matters stood, and hastened to the rescue : he got close beside the ass, and to the smith's inquiry he said,

" It's here in my pocket, and mighty fine tabakky it is !— see. I got a bargain o' some from a friend a while agone, and — but don't minition it — if you like I'll share the bargain wid you, to the value of a new set o' shoes for the baste."

" Gor ! that ud be a power o' tabakky !" said the smith.

" But it's iligant tabakky," said Solomon. Pulling from his pocket several yards of the material, wound into a close ball, and popping it under the smith's nose, he said, " What do you think o' that, your sowl !"

" Faix, that is tarein' tabakky, sure enough !" was the delighted smith's reply.

" Well, what do you say to a new set o' shoes for the baste ?" said Solomon.

" I dunna," was the undecided answer.

" You know you 'll have the owld shoes in."

" To be sure I will," said the smith, " sure that's only nath'ral : but what good is a little ass's shoes ?"

" Oh, shoes is shoes," said Solomon.

" Why, tare alive ! they are wore as thin as a sixpence."

" 'Deed, that is threue," said Solomon, "fer the last set he had an him was from the finest smith in Ireland : they wore powerful."

" Arrah, who's that ?" said the workman, piqued at the mention of the finest smith in Ireland, he himself not being the person meant.

" Why, who would it be but Brian Branagan ?" said Solomon, who well knew that Brian Branagan was the rival of the man who stood before him, and living in the adjoining lane, but who had never made shoes for the tinker's ass in his life.

This was a master-touch of Solomon,—the smith bristled directly for the palm of superiority.

" Why, thin, is it Branagan you say is the finest smith in Ireland ?"

" Yis," said Solomon very quietly.

" Throth, then, it's little you know about it. Branagan indeed ! The devil a bigger botch ever dhruv a nail than the same Branagan : he a smith !!"

" Oh ! I don't purtend to know indeed," said Solomon with an affected air of not wishing to offend, at the same time laying hold of the halter of the ass. "But he's good enough for me, anyhow: good mornin' kindly to you," said he, going.

This was too much for the smith.

"Come back here, I tell you ! it's I that'll show you what a set o' shoes is : Branagan indeed!"

"Well, will you take what I said ?" said Solomon, affecting not to care much whether the smith did or not.

"Yis, yis, but never say the word Branagan to me !" Here he laid hold of his pincers, knife, and hammer, and began to knock off the points of the nails from each hoof, and pull off the ass's shoes — every drag he gave, which was with great vigour, accompanied by a "hugh," and the exclamation of "Branagan indeed !!"

"Hadn't I better take off the straddle," said Solomon.

"Ay, off wid it," said the smith.

So, Solomon took off the highly-perfumed straddle that was so near betraying him, and then filling the smith's pipe, and his own too, with some of the tobacco which he had sold to the smith, he commenced puffing away vigorously, that the smell of the lighted weed might prevent the perfume of the dry being noticed.

While the smith was engaged in shoeing the ass inside the forge, Solomon had time to disengage the roll of stolen tobacco from the heap of cinders where he had concealed it, and hiding it in one of his old kettles, he was quite at ease, and blew the bellows for the smith while he heated the iron, or looked over him at work with an air of delight, saying, as the smith rasped up and finished his work. "Well, but thim is the rale iligant shoes!"

" You'll never talk o' Branagan agin, will you, afther that?" said the smith.

" Throth, an' I won't," said Solomon; " and sure it's only an owld fool I was, up to this present time, in thinkin' the like : but the owldher we grow, the more we larn. Sure, it's a grate loss to me I didn't know you sooner!"

"Well, it's never too late to mind," said the smith.

"Thru for you," said Solomon; "nor to make, aither." And so saying, he filled his pipe again from the smith's tobacco, and wishing him good-morning, off he went, having secured his plunder, and getting a new set of shoes on his ass; so that he was now ready for a long and prosperous round, through his usual beat.

The smith idled the rest of that day, smoking at his new stock of "bakky," drinking to quench his thirst, and filling up the intervals by snapping his fingers and crying, "That for Branagan!"

CHAPTER XII.

"IN THE DARK ALL CATS ARE GREY." — RORY BECOMES POSSESSED OF AN IMPORTANT SECRET, AND DISCLOSES ONE IN EXCHANGE.

WHEN Rory O'More was admitted to the safe side of the door, he felt the pressure of a hand upon his arm, which he interpreted into the meaning of "be quiet;" and as it was Rory's own opinion that, in his present circumstances, it was the best thing he could do, he acquiesced. One thing however he was sure of—that it was a woman who admitted him to the house, for he felt the soft breathing of one of the gentle sex upon his cheek as he stood motionless by the door beside his benefactress, while they heard a few words passing between the colonel and the sentinel, until the latter descended the steps.

Immediately after, Rory heard the woman say gently, "Come down, darlin'!" and holding the hand that was laid upon his arm, he followed his conductress as softly as he could. They soon began to descend some stairs, and before they had reached the bottom of the flight, the sound of a bolt being drawn was heard upstairs, and Rory's friend said in a suppressed voice of terror, "Oh, murdher! there's the colonel comin' down! you must hide in the coal-hole. Make haste, for the love o' God, or I'm a ruined woman!—here, here!" and she dragged Rory along while she spoke. "Get in there, as far as ever you can, and hide yourself, or I dunna what will become of the pair of us!"

At the same time, she opened a door and pushed Rory inside of it. He heard her footsteps retreat lightly and rapidly. "More openings of doors!" said Rory to himself as he scrambled over some coal and slack, holding his arms extended to save his nose from fracture; and he found the coal-vault extensive, for it was some time before he was stopped by a wall. As soon as he went as far as he could go, he crouched down, keeping his face however turned towards the point whence he entered, and he soon heard the descending footsteps of the person he was taught to believe was the colonel. The footsteps seemed to ramble over a great space of flagged apartments, and various doors squeaked on their hinges as they were opened and shut in succession by the invisible perambulant. At last Rory saw the glimmer of a light, which grew stronger by degrees, until the door of the cellar opened, and then he saw a Don Quixote sort of a man, with a candle in one hand and a drawn sword in the other, poke his head in at the door of the cellar, and holding the candle a yard before him, say, "Is there any one here?"

Rory knew better than to make any answer this time, and having thrown the tail of his coat over his head, leaving only a small peep-hole for his eyes, he remained undistinguishable amidst the surrounding gloom ; for the vault was so deep, the candle so dim, the colonel so short-sighted, and Rory crouched so low, that he quite defied observation. Despite his dangerous situation, however, it was as much as Rory could do not to laugh ; for the colonel, with his long face, long candle, long body, long arms, long sword, long legs, and short shirt, cut so ridiculous a figure, that a man of more solid mood than Rory might have been provoked to mirth. However, by good luck, Rory did not laugh, though the colonel, à la Don Quixote, continued to open his goggle eyes on the gloom before him ; but he was startled from his fixed observation by hearing a slip amongst the coal, which drew forth a still fiercer demand of “Who's there?”—Upon this summons, Rory perceived, between him and the light, a great cat cautiously crawl to the summit of the heap of coal, and, with a tail bristling to the size of a sweeping brush, make a desperate rush down the acclivity and dart between the colonel's legs. The man of war actually jumped with alarm at the suddenness of the surprise, and, as if ashamed of being so frightened at such a cause, muttered spitefully, “D—n the cat!” He now retired from the cellar, and went to wake (as he thought) the woman-servant who let Rory in, and whose sleeping apartment was in the basement story. Rory heard him cry, “Betty!”—no answer. “Betty!” again,—still silence preserved. “Betty!” still louder than before;—Rory heard a snort and a growl as if from a suddenly-awakened person.

“Who’s that?” said a female voice.

“Your master: have you heard any noise in the house?”

“Noise, sir?”

“Yes, noise,—have you heard any?”

“No, sir: I have been in bed, sir, and asleep, these three hours. I hope there’s nothing the matther, sir?” said Betty with very honest seeming.

“I have been disturbed,” said the colonel; “and I thought robbers had got into the house. I certainly heard a noise.”

"Oh, I dar say, sir," said Betty ; " 'twas nothing, but the cat : he's mighty throuble-some and lively, that cat is,—and I forget to shut him up sometimes — and I'm afeard he has been disturbing you, sir. Oh dear, but I'm sorry!"

This was a good guess of Betty's; for the colonel having seen a cat, now retired, and Rory was once more left in darkness. And now that the immediate chance of discovery was removed, he began to conjecture by what extraordinary means he was let into a house to which he was an utter stranger, at the moment he needed it most, and by a woman of whom he knew no more than the man in the moon: her name was Betty—that was all the knowledge he arrived at,—and that he only knew from hearing the colonel address her.

After the lapse of half an hour, Rory heard the name of "Darby" whispered at the door of the cellar.

In equally gentle tone, he barely ventured to say, rather huskily, "Iss."

"Come out, darlin'; take care you don't rowl down any of the big lumps o' coal."

Rory, profiting by the caution, got out with as little noise as possible; and coming in contact with his female guide, he was led into an apartment, the door of which was very cautiously locked by the woman.

"Now we may spake more at our aise," said she. "How are you, darlin'?"

"Indeed I'm throubled with a mighty bad cowld," said Rory, who thought this the best thing he could say whereby to account for the husky tone in which he spoke, that his natural voice might not betray the mistake which had so far favoured him.

"Oh, but your voice is gone intirely, Darby darlin'!" says the woman: "but here's somethin' to comfort you, agra; here"—and she led him to where a chair and table stood—"here, sit down and ate your supper: there's an iligant piece o' roast beef, and a jug of beautiful beer, I kept sly for you. If you like, I'll light a candle for you."

"Oh, by no manes!" said Rory; "it's betther not: as the house was alarmed, the light might be bad."

"No,—it's not that so much, but I'm afeard o' the noise o' sthrikin' the flint."

"Don't think of it, Betty dear," grumbled Rory.

"Lord! how your voice is althered!"

"Indeed I'm chokin' with the cowld—hegh! hegh! Oh, murdher!"

"Ate a bit, and it'll do you good. I'm grieved you haven't a light, darlin'; 'twould be sitch a comfort to you!"

"I don't miss it in the laste, Betty: I can find the way to my mouth in the dark."

And so saying, Rory began to eat his supper, which was most acceptable to him for two reasons:—first, he was hungry; and in the next place, the occupation accounted for his silence, which it was so desirable to preserve.

"But, you villian! what did you ring that thievin' bell for?"

" 'Twas a mistake, darlin' — hegh ! hegh !
hegh ! Oh ! this cowld is chokin' me !"

" Don't distress yourself talkin', Darby dear ; relieve yourself with the mate and the dhrink."

Rory obeyed.

" I run up the minit I heard the bell ; and, sure, wasn't it the hoighth o' good luck that I got you in before the colonel kem down ! Oh !
he'd murdher me, I'm sure, if he thought how it was ! But, afther all, Darby jewel, what harm is there in an honest woman havin' her husband to come see her ? — sure it's nath'ral."

" To be sure, Betty jewel," said Rory, who now perceived that he was mistaken by Betty for her husband ; and Rory's inventive imagination set to work in fancying what a dilemma he should be in, in case the real husband might arrive. In the mean time, however, he fortified his patience and resolution with the beef and beer, which did great credit to the colonel's larder and cellar.

" But you 're not atein', Darby dear," said Betty.

" No, but I 'm dhrinkin'," said Rory.

" Much good do your heart, jewel ! But, tell me, how is Johnny ?"

Now, who the deuce Johnny was, Rory could not tell ; but supposing, from the diminutive form of the name, it might be her child, he thought it best to please her with a favourable answer ; so he said, " Johnny 's very well."

" Thank God !" said Betty. " He 's a fine craythur : how well he got over it !"

" Iligant !" said Rory, who wondered what it was Johnny got over.

" And how is the hives ?" said Betty.

" They 're all where they wor," said Rory, who did not dream of any other hives than bee-hives ; while Betty meant the cutaneous eruption that " Johnny " was suffering under.

" And has none o' thim disappeared ?" said Betty.

" Oh ! no," said Rory; " we take great care o' thim."

" Do, darlin', do ; — keep 'em from cowld."

" Oh yis; we put sthraw over them," said Rory.

" Sthraw !" said Betty ; " why, thin, is it takin' lave o' your sinses you are, Darby ? Is it sthraw on the hives ?"

" Sartinly ; sure the bees likes it."

" Bees !" said Betty ; " arrah, what bees ?"

" Why, the bees in the hives," said Rory.

" Arrah, man, don't be goin' on with your humbuggin' ! you know I'm axin' about the child very well, and you must go on with your thricks about bee-hives. I hate humbuggin', so I do, Darby, — and you know I do ; and you will be goin' on, all I can say."

Rory saw there was some mistake ; and to stop Betty, he said, " Whisht, whisht !"

" What is it ?" said Betty.

" Don't talk so much, or maybe they'll hear uz."

Betty was silent for some time ; but as perfect stillness seemed to reign in the house, she returned to the charge on the hives.

" But, tell me, is the hives all out?"

" Av coarse," said Rory.

" And do they look well?"

" Mighty purty indeed," said Rory ; " and there 'll be a power o' honey in them, I 'm sure."

Betty now gave him a box on the ear, saying, " Devil sweep you ! you will be humbuggin' so you will. . You cruel brute ! can't you make fun of anything but the poor child that is lyin' undher the hives ?"

" Sure, I tell you the child is well and hearty ; and isn't that enough ?" said Rory.

" And it 's only jokin' you wor ?" said Betty.

" To be sure," said Rory ; " you ought to know my ways by this time. — This is mighty fine beef !"

" But, 'deed an' 'deed, is Johnny —"

" Bad luck to the word more I 'll say !" said Rory, affecting an angry silence.

Betty now changed her ground, and thought a bit of scandal confided to Darby, would amuse him ; so she began to tell him that, suppose the colonel should find out she brought her husband into the house, he had no right to complain, for at all events it was her own husband, and nobody else.

Rory chuckled at her confidence.

"Not all as one," said Betty, "as him—with another man's wife! Purty goin's on."

"Do you tell me so?" said Rory.

"I found it all out, so he'd betther say nothin' to me, or I could desthroy him. Not that she's a bit worse than ever she was; but if the collecthor knew it—"

Rory cocked his ears. "Is it Scrubbs you mane?"

"Who else," said Betty.

"And his wife?" said Rory.

"—Is come over on a visit, by the way — but I know what I know."

"How long ago?" said Rory.

"Since you were here last," said Betty.

"That's a long time," thought Rory to himself.

"Scrubbs went to town last week, and over comes madam — on a visit. Av coorse she'll go back when she expects her nate man home. But it sarves him right! — what could he expec' when he tuk up with the likes of her, the dirty cur!"

Betty went on for some time in this strain, venting the vials of her wrath on the colonel and Mrs. Scrubbs ; and Rory did not interrupt her, for he was glad the more she talked, as it relieved him from the difficulty of remaining concealed under her questions. After exhausting her news and her abuse, she began to ask Rory more questions, to all of which he replied by the exclamation of " Whisht," protesting at the same time he was afraid to speak for fear of discovery by the colonel. At last, when Betty found he had cleared the dish and emptied the jug, she said,

" You had betther come to bed now, darlin'."

This was a poser, and Rory said " Whisht" again.

" Come to bed, jewel — you 'll be more comfortabler there than sittin' here in the cowld, and we can talk without any fear o' bein' heerd, with our heads undher the blankets."

"I can't bear my head undher the blankets," said Rory.

"That's newly come to you, thin," said Betty.

"That is since this cowld," said Rory, recovering himself: "it chokes me, this cowld does."

"There's not a finer thing in the world for a cowld than to go to bed," said Betty.

"But the cowld rises in my throat to that degree when I lie down," said Rory, "that it smothers me."

"May be 'twould be betther to-night, darlin'?" said Betty.

"I'd rather sit up," said Rory.

"You'll be lost with the cowld," said Betty, "and no fire in the grate."

Rory found Betty was determined to have matters her own way, and began to get puzzled how he should avoid this difficulty, and the only chance of escape he saw open to him, was to request the tender and confiding Betty to prepare herself for a "grate saycret" he had to tell her, and that she would promise when he informed her of it, not to be too much surprised.

Betty protested to preserve the most philosophic composure.

" You won't screech?" said Rory.

" What would I screech for?" said Betty.

" It's mighty surprisin'," said Rory.

" Arrah, don't keep me waitin', but let me have it at wanst," said Betty eagerly.

" Now, darlin' take it aisy," said Rory, " for you must know —"

" What?" said Betty.

" I'm not Darby," said Rory.

Betty scarcely suppressed a scream.

" You villian!" said she.

" I'm not a villian, aither," said Rory.

" What brought you here at all?"

" Yourself," said Rory: "sure, wasn't it yourself pulled me inside the hall-door?"

" But, sure, I thought it was Darby was in it."

" Well, and havn't I been honest enough to tell you I'm not Darby, at last, when it might have been troublesome to your conscience, Betty?"

"Ay," said the woman, "there's more o' your roguery! Betty too! — how did you make out my name, you devil's limb?"

"A way o' my own, Betty."

"Oh, a purty rogue you are, I go bail — throth it's not the first house you got into, I dare say, nor the first poor woman you entrapped, you midnight desaiver — and takin' up my name too."

"Well, I haven't taken away your name anyhow; so don't be so fractious."

"Arrah, but how do I know but you will?"

"Well, it's time enough to cry when you're hurt, Betty, — keep yourself cool now — there's no harm done."

"No harm indeed! Curse your impidince! — No harm! Why, how do I know but it's a robber you are maybe? Faith, I b'lieve I'd best rise the house and own this thing to the colonel."

"Betty dear," said Rory very quietly, "have a little wit in your anger, agra! think o' your charâchter, Betty."

"Oh my charâchter, my charâchter, sure enough it's ruined for ever ! Oh, what'll I do !” And she was going to cry and make a fool of herself when Rory reminded her that crying would do no good.

“ The curse o’ Crum’ll an you ! what brought you nigh the place at all ? and who are you ?”

“ No matther who I am, but I tell you what is the best thing you can do : jist let me stay quietly in the house until the dawn, and thin let me out onknownst.”

“ Oh, I darn’t, I darn’t,” said Betty. “ Sure if you wor seen quittin’ the place, ’twould be the ruin o’ me !”

“ By dad ! I must quit it some time or other,” said Rory : “ and sure if you let me out now itself, maybe the colonel will hear the door opening ; or even if he doesn’t, sure the sojers is now on the watch, and would catch me.”

“ Oh, you mustn’t go out by the front,” said Betty : “ I’ll let you out into the garden at the back, and you must get over the wall, for here you mustn’t stay—that’s tee-totally out o’ the question.”

"Well, anything for a quiet life," said Rory ; "do what you plaze with me : but I think, as I am here, you might as well let me sit up here till towards mornin'?"

"No, no, no!" said Betty in great tribulation. "Who knows but Darby might come ! and then what in the wide world would I do !".

"You should keep him out," said Rory.

"Out, indeed !" said Betty,—"keep Darby out ! Sure, he'd suspec' somethin' wasn't right, for he's as jealous as a turkey-cock, and he'd murdher me if he thought how it was. Oh, what brought you here at all !"

At this moment, some pebbles were thrown against the area window.

"Oh, by this and that," said Betty, "there he is.—Oh, what'll become o' me !"

"Tut ! woman alive," said Rory, who endeavoured to make her attend, for she became almost confounded by the difficulty of her situation, and was clapping her hands and uttering a volley of Oh's,—"Tut ! woman, don't be clap pin' your hands like a washwoman and makin' an uproar, but jist let me out smart into the garden, and I'll get over the wall, as you towld me."

Betty seemed aroused to action by Rory's suggestion, and now led him to a back window, which she opened carefully; and telling Rory to get out softly, she handed him a chair, and then followed herself. She conducted him then to the end of the garden, and placing the chair close to the wall, she held it firmly, while Rory got upon the back rail, which enabled him to lay his hands on the top of the brickwork, and he soon scrambled up and dropped himself on the outside. On his landing, he ran as fast and lightly as he could from the quarter where the sentinels were placed, and so far escaped unobserved, and continued in a straight line up a narrow street that opened from one of the corners of the green. Here he paused a while before deciding which way he should proceed; for, in the hurry of leaving the house, he never thought of asking Betty which was the way to go. Rory took the first turn out of this street that chance suggested, and was getting on famously, as he thought ; but while in the very act of congratulating himself on his wonderful deliverance from the soldiers, he turned another corner, and was scarcely round it, when a startling “ Who’s there ? ” was uttered a few paces ahead of him, and the rattling of a firelock accompanied the challenge.

Rory saw the game was up, and that after all his former luck, it was his fate to become a prisoner ; so he approached the point whence he was challenged, and said, “ A friend.”

“ Advance and give the countersign,” said the sentinel, emerging from a sentry-box.

“ I haven’t sitch a thing about me, sir,” said Rory.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

LONDON :

PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLEY,
Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

3462

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA

3 0112 049101535